RESTORED TO CHURCH.

The famous old Church of San Francisco, in the City of Mexico, the center of Catholic activities for 300 years, but which was lost in its confiscation by the government and afterwards passed into Protestant hands, has been regained for Catholic usage and re-dedicated.

Scores of workmen have been engaged on its renovation and adornment since the purchase of the church by a syndicate of wealthy Mexicans last year, and while lacking in its ancient splendor of appointment, the structure at present shows forth with at least a portion of its historic grandeur.

The splendid church of San Francisco originally covered over ten acres of land, and is the most historic religious edifice in Mexico and among the most noted in the New World. It was, in fact, seven great edifices surrounded by gardens and enclosing a cemetery, and was the center from which the Franciscan Fathers worked until their operation covered the entire of Mexico and overflowed into the United States and Central America. The part which this church took in political affairs in 1824, says a correspondent of the St. Louis Globe Democrat, was what caused its downfall. Cortez, the conqueror of Mexico, attended Mass there, and for a time his bones were buried in one of the church vaults. Through three centuries the festivals of the Spanish viceroys were held in its halls, where was sung the first Te Deum of Mexican independence. In this a prominent figure was General Augustin Iturbide, the virtual winner of his nation's independence, and whose body was taken there for final services after he had been shot by the Mexicans for having royal aspirations.

Around no other building in all Mexico cluster such scores of incidents in politics and religion as hang about the demolished but still handsome pile.

The main existing church, which was the scene of the recent ceremonies, was primarily dedicated in 1716, and although shorn of its ancient splendors, it retains a large part of its historic grandeur. In its construction it is a single great nave. Its vaulted roof springs aloft without a break from floor to summit, and supports three domes, the highest of which is 90 feet and bears a lantern 24 feet high. The nave is 56 feet wide and with the apse 230 feet in length.

Large sums of money were lavished on the structure and its adornment, the silver tabernacle of the altar alone costing $24,000. The seven beautiful chapels surrounding the main edifice were called Purisima Concepcion, San Antonio, El Senor de Burgos, Dolores, Tercer Orden, Nuestra Senora de Aranazuz and San Jose de los Naturales. Around these swept a massive wall, inclosing what is now four regularly sized city blocks and which included the Iturbide, Jardin, San Carlos, American and Guardilos hotels, the Lottery buildings, German and American clubs, the Catholic churches of San Felipe de Jesus and Colegio de Los Ninos, the Protestant churches of Trinity Methodist and Union Evangelican and many other large buildings mainly used for business purposes.

The streets of Independencia and Gante have been cut through the massive piles as a result of the reformation, the first blow of which was aimed against the Franciscans in 1856.

It was charged by President Comonfort that there was a plot fostered in the Franciscan church fortress to overthrow the existing republican government; he at once attached the place, and it was taken possession of by the federal troops. The walls were torn down to admit the cutting in two of the dangerous stronghold by opening up the present Independencia street, and Comonfort declared the monastery suppressed. This was not carried out at the time, but was accomplished four years later, by President Juarez, who established Gante street through the cemetery of the monastery and drove out all the priests. Juarez destroyed the altars, took down the bells from the towers and otherwise made ineffective the traditions of the place.

The jewels and pictures were removed to other places for rest, and the main entrance to the structure closed by the erection of a row of residences on the western side. The massive pile was left to darkness and decay and was used for many alien purposes at different times. Congress met in one of its halls for a season and the main temple was used for some years as a riding school by a street [illegible]

A CHARMING EXHIBITION OF INTEREST TO ALL WOMEN AND ALL LOVERS OF SILKS

The parlors at the Powers, in which were exhibited the exquisite display of art novelties brought to Rochester by the Richardson Silk Co., were thronged Wednesday and Thursday with representations of Rochester's best society. Very delicate in character and beautiful in creation, were the pieces of embroidery work which were on exhibition; the work shown being made with the Richardson high art washable embroidery silks.

These excellent silks, which are quite new upon the market, are strong, thoroughly washable, and made in 260 different shades. Miss M. L. Davison, who does the color blending and designing for the company, who was in attendance, is a well known expert in color, and a skilled needle woman. She has been at the factory in Belding, Michigan, for the past four months, bringing these silks to perfection.

The result is seen in the beautiful gradation of shades shown, and the artistic work presented.

She took great pleasure in explaining the merits of the silks to all visitors who were much interested in the exhibition, regretting only that it could not remain longer, so that more could have the pleasure of seeing it.

Among the pieces especially admired were three of church embroidery, being for use of the clergy, in which the delicate and difficult shadings of color in the green and purple have been performed with scrupulous fidelity.

The exhibition was in charge of Mr. F. S. Almy, state agent for the Richardson Silk Company.
