INSTALLMENT V

Dan broke all records for dressing and rushed to the front door of the flat, where Mary Roden was waiting.

"What is it, Mary?" he demanded. "Is anything the matter?"

"Oh, no, nothing's the matter," Mary replied quickly. "I'm sorry if I got you out of bed, but I know this is important to you. A half hour ago Mr. Heron, manager of the Sheridan apartments, called our house. He said he'd given you two suits to be pressed and returned to him by tomorrow afternoon."

"That's right," Dan agreed.

"Well, he's changed his plans and is going to take a plane in the morning, so he has to have those suits not later than 8 o'clock. Father went clear out on the west side to see his brother tonight and is staying all night. The presser lives so far away that we could not reach him. So I said I'd come over and get you to go down to the shop and press the suits. That way, you can deliver them to Mr. Heron first thing in the morning."

"Sure," said Dan. "I'm glad you came because I wouldn't disappoint Mr. Heron for anything. Did you bring a key to the shop?"

"Yes."

Dan and Mary walked down the stairs to the street. It was almost deserted. Dan turned to Mary.

"You'd better come down to the shop while I press the suits and then let me talk you home," he said. "Your father wouldn't want you out this late alone."

"All right," said Mary. "Maybe I can help you and to tell the truth I was a little frightened on the way over."

It took them only a few minutes to reach the shop. Dan knew how to operate the pressing machine and with Mary plying an iron to help, they had Mr. Heron's two suits pressed in no time. Dan hung them on their hangers and surveyed them with satisfaction.

"There," he exclaimed. "I'll take them with me and deliver them before I come to the shop tomorrow."

Then he told Mary about what he had learned that afternoon. While they talked they turned off the light in the rear of the shop and moved up front. The only light there was a dim one which burned all night and Mary was listening so breathlessly to Dan's story that the thought of turning on another never occurred to them.

"I think you're right, Dan," Mary exclaimed at last. "I believe this whole thing has been a plot by old Mr. Silver. Of course Father won't be able to prove it, but maybe he can get a lawyer and do something anyway."

"And if Mr. Heron hadn't happened to tell me about the new apartment building, your Dad would have moved out at the end of the month and gone out of business. He was frightened to death that the racketeers would do something to you."

Mary nodded. "I know," she said. "He's been terribly upset."

They had reached the door leading to the deserted street when Dan suddenly paused, listening intently.

"What was that?" he said in a startled voice.

For a long silent second the listener Then Dan turned wide eyes to Mary.

"Sounds like someone at the rear door of the shop," he said. "You stay here by the front door, Mary, and run and yell for the police if I say the word. I'm going back to have a look."

Cautiously Dan tiptoed to the curtain that covered the door leading to the workroom in the rear, while Mary stood tensely at the street door. He pulled the curtain aside an inch and pressed his eye to the opening.

Dan's body stiffened. Dimly he could see the form of a man outlined against the back door which was open. The door was closed softly and Dan lost the figure for a moment. Then he saw it again over in one corner stooping, fumbling with something.

"Another bomb!" was the first thought that entered Dan's head. He prepared to yell a warning to Mary. Then he saw the flicker of a match. But no fuse was lit. Instead, the intruder touched the match to a pile of waste and paper that he had hastily piled in a corner. As it flared into flame Dan leaped around.

"Fire, Mary!" he yelled. "Run to the corner and pull the alarm box!"

He heard Mary dash from the front door as he flung the curtains aside and raced back through the shop. The blaze was already licking its way to the ceiling but he did not stop. He had to catch that man!

He leaped through the open rear door and saw him in the alley, stumbling away. Evidently he had been startled almost out of his wits by Dan's sudden cry. In a half dozen jumps Dan was upon him. With a savage dive he landed on the man's shoulders and bore him to the rough bricks of the alley.

To his amazement, he encountered no resistance. The man's body was shaking with fright. Roughly Dan turned him over, and then he uttered a gasp of amazement. In the dim light he recognized the fear-crazed face of Old Man Silver.

"You!" cried Dan. "Why, I thought it was one of those fake racketeers you sent over here."

"Let me up, let me up!" Old Man Silver quavered. "I'll tell you everything. I didn't mean any harm. The building's going to be torn down in a few weeks, anyway."

"Yes, but if it burns down, you'll collect insurance on it, and also get out of your lease with Mr. Roden! But it won't work, you old crook! Instead you'll pay Mr. Roden plenty and probably go to jail in the bargain." As Dan jerked the trembling mumbling man to his feet he heard the wail of fire sirens. He looked toward the shop, and saw flames flickering redly inside. He pushed Old Man Silver in front of him and rushed down the alley to the boulevard, and around the corner. The fire engines were already drawing up in front of the shop.

He found Mary there white of face talking to a policeman. She gave a glad cry of relief when she saw Dan. Dan pushed Old Man Silver into the arms of the policeman.

"There he is," he said. "I caught him setting fire to this building."

* * *

At two minutes before eight the following morning, Dan was knocking on the door of Mr. Heron's apartment. The building manager greeted him with a smile.

"Well, there you are with my suits, bright and early!" he cried. "Good boy. Say, I hear you had a fire in your shop last night."

"Yes, but your suits were out front and weren't damaged," Dan told him. "It wasn't much of a fire anyway and the firemen put it right out. But did you know I caught the man who started it?"

"No."

"Yes, sir! It was Old Man Silver and he's in jail this morning. I don't know what they'll do to him, but he has confessed to starting the fire, and to setting a couple of fake racketeers on us to try to get Mr. Roden to break his lease."

Mr. Heron exclaimed again, then demanded all the details. When Dan had supplied them, he shook his head.

"Our company knew nothing about Mr. Roden's lease when we arranged to buy the property from Silver. But you tell Mr. Roden not to worry. We'll see that he gets a shop when we tear down those old buildings and I think we'll make a place for him in the new building when it's built. That is," and Mr. Heron grinned, "we'll do that if you keep on working for him."

"Don't worry," said Dan. "I'll be there."

Friday, April 1 will be a real April Fool's Day. The boys directors of the Genesee Institute will play the basketball league champions in a battle which bids fair to be a real battle. The directors have been practicing faithfully for two weeks to get in shape for this battle with their younger opponents. A large crowd is expected for this fray. For the teachers the three Russos, Pavone, Columbo, Cali and Pallara are expected to do the heavy scoring for Coach Macelli's team. The game will get under way at 9 P. M.

Spring training for the baseball players at the Genesee Institute was in evidence last week. Unexpected hot weather put the diamond at Fromm Place in excellent shape and as a result some 100 boys had their first taste of outdoor activity. Two 8 team leagues are to be formed, one for boys 11-14 years of age and one for the boys 15-18 years.

Hidden Desires Revealed—As Mayor Loses Dog

GENEVA—The Geneva Circle of Columbian Squires enjoyed an evening of unusual entertainment at their Scavenger Hunt which was held on Tuesday, March 22.

Included in the list of required articles were the signature of a policeman, a picture of Mayor Charles F. Nieder, a set of the auto license plates and whatever the hunter might interpret as What everybody wants. This last item brought in everything from money and candy to the Mayor's Irish Setter and a bottle of castor oil.

Charles O'Malley, who acted as judge in the contest, was hard put to hand down his decision but finally awarded the prize to Theodore Veit and his party.

WELL, THAT'S PERFECT

Yes," said the man in the ancient car coat with bulging pockets. "Bill and I are in partnership but we don't carry the same goods."

"Explain yourself," said a friend.

"Well, Bill goes around selling stove polish that leaves a stain on the fingers and I go around next day with the only soap that will take it off."
