St. James, Greater, Is Patron of Many Trades

Patron of druggists, pilgrims, wax chandlers and laborers is St. James the Greater, an Apostle and martyr, who was called the Greater to distinguish him from James the Less, who was probably shorter in nature. With Peter and John he was present at the raising of the daughter of Jairus, the Transfiguration and the Agony. He was ordered killed by Herod Agrippa, and the Spaniards honor him as the first apostle of their country.

Declares Press Needs Christian Guidance

NEW YORK. — Editors and members of the clergy should be in closer contact and should arrange guidance conferences from time to time.

Henry Martin, editor-in-chief of Press Association, a Reuter affiliate, addressing the Provincial Newspaper Editors of Great Britain in London, declared: "I favor similar and equal contact with the Roman Catholic Church and the Free Churches. Thus the broad Christian angle on national or international issues would tend to find expression in editorial comment and policy."

Speaking on "The Place of Religions in the Post-War Press," the text of which appears in the current issue of Editor and Publisher, Mr. Martin continued: "Contact between editors and the local clergy and ministers might be made more effective, more sincere and mutually profitable."

Mr. Martin stressed that there is no room in the press for suggestive or unedifying articles, or for unnecessary reports of court cases of a salacious nature.

To the Christian soul, a follower of Christ, life ought to be an education in spiritual love, not merely natural love but that love which is above all nature—the love of the Divine Saviour, Who is everything to us.
