Sigrid Undset Sees Chance For Catholicism in Norway

New York — (NC) — Will history repeat itself? asks Sigrid Undset, convert and Nobel prize winner, in an article on the Church in Norway, describing how the first seeds of the Faith were planted there by English missionaries.

Will the renaissance of Catholic culture in Norway stem from the same source? she asks, writing in the current issue of St. Ansgar's Bulletin, published here.

The truths of Catholicism were brought to Norway by Benedictine monks of Glastonbury in the tenth century under the reign of Haakon the Good, she writes. The monks were invited to Norway by the King, but their reception was anything but friendly, she continues. The peasants tore down the church and killed the priests.

After tracing the slow progress of Catholicism amid many bloody struggles, and its destruction during the so-called Reformation Madame Undset says that new impetus to Catholic culture in Norway came from France during the nineteenth century. However, the present world conflict, she says, has rendered Norway more open to the influence and culture of the English-speaking nations.

God-willing, she concludes, some day English-speaking priests will follow in the footsteps of the unnamed martyrs from Glastonbury and give birth to Catholicism in Norway.
