Buddhists Switch Stand, Force Birth Control Ban

Colombo, Ceylon — (NC) — Ceylon's government has ended its family planning activities.

The step against artificial contraception is a result of pressure on the health ministry and political leaders by Buddhist monks, who have denounced birth control, abortion, and sterilization as immoral and unnatural.

The change in government family planning policies reflects a similar switch of position by the Buddhists themselves, who a few years ago fostered birth control, while Christians, Moslems and Hindus opposed it.

The Buddhists once far outnumbered the rest of Ceylon's religious communities, but their numerical superiority has been dwindling. Observers here attribute the Buddhists' change of attitude toward birth control directly to their declining strength.

Two bills recently introduced in parliament, one calling for compulsory abortion in certain cases and the other for sterilization of the unfit, have been tabled after preliminary discussion.

In October 1969, the Ceylonese government, under Buddhist pressure, ordered suspension of official family planning propaganda. In December 1969, the government turned down an offer of financial aid for birth control efforts made by the International Development Association.
