of heaven, "as the dark shades of the palette are made use of by the artist to set in relief the higher lights of the picture," and he even finds that the condemned may come to find a certain comfort in the society of each other-perhaps on the old principle that misery is lessened when experienced in company. Finally he asserts that early associations and inherited influences may play some part and bring about a palliation of pun-ishment. Thus, at certain times of the ishment. Thus at certain times of the vear-the period of the nativity, the crucifixion, etc.-there may be a modification of the sufferings of the damned, and after some ages the pangs may be materially lessened altogether. disorders has been traced to the impure The writer puts forth all this merely as a suggestion and holds himself ready to withdraw anything that may not be in strict accordance with the teaching of the church on the subject he thus ingeniously discusses. His purpose is not to call in question the doctrines of Christianity, but merely to smooth the path to faith for those who find it difficult and impossible to accept the doctrine of material fire and never ending, unabated torment.

Naturally there are many already up in arms against this pleasanter and more comforting view of the state of condemnation after death. Yet it is hard to reconcile the brighter vision with the unmistakable language of Scripture and of the fathers. Both declare, in words of incontrovertible import, hell to be a state of absolute and endless and apparently unmitigated anguish.—Catholic Mirror.

When Is the Pope Infallible? The Rev. S. M. Brandi, of the society of the Jesuits, contributes to The North American Review an article in which he attempts to explain just when the pope is infallible. He points out that in Catholic theology the infallible pope does not mean one gifted with inspiration or commissioned to reveal to the Catholic world new dogmas. He says: The special assistance of the Holy Ghost is given to the pope for the only purpose of preserving, explaining and lefending the revelations already made to and through the apostles. An infallible pope cannot be said to be one who can never err in his private conversations and teachings, or who cannot make any mistake in politics, government, etc., for the gift of infallibility, as held by Catholics, belongs to the pope only in his official capacity as supreme teacher of the church and only
