Result of the City Elections.

ROME, ITALY.

The success of the Catholics in the Roman Municipal elections was very complete, more complete than it has ever been before. According to the definitive results, thirty-two Catholic Councilors were proposed and elected. Eighty-five Liberal Councilors were proposed, but only forty-eight elected. The Catholic Councilors were elected by 101 votes—i.e., 7,347 votes per head. The forty-eight Liberals polled 300,511 votes—i.e., 6,260 votes per head. Thus no Catholic votes were lost, whereas the thirty-six defeated Liberal candidates represent a loss of 123,850 votes. The Catholic Party will, therefore, possess the balance of power in the government of the city, and should the Liberals elected prove as discordant as the Liberals electing, the Catholic Party will have the power of a majority. They have also achieved success in the provincial elections, seven Catholic and nine Liberals being elected, the Catholics heading the list with crushing majorities in three of the mandamenti or electoral divisions. It is useless to comment upon the results of these elections. The figures given are in themselves an eloquent testimony to the falsehood of the Liberal vaunt that the Roman question is dead—and buried. The compact body which glories in the name of Catholic represents the historic Rome and perpetuates the rights of the Holy See. "What is your hope of the Temporal Power as far as the Italian people is concerned?" I once asked of a prelate at the Vatican. "It is in their indestructible Christianity," he answered. "Their fidelity to the Catholic religion necessarily implies their devotion to the Holy See, and when God's hour comes they will act as one man towards its liberation."

The news of the death of Cardinal Malagola has been received with great sorrow at Rome. The sad event occurred last Saturday. The deceased Cardinal was born at Modena on December 24, 1840. His career was rapid and successful. From the ancient and venerable Collegio Ghislieri, he passed to the Noble Ecclesiastical Academy. At Imola he occupied a canonry, distinguishing himself meantime in the exercise of the apostolic ministry, and most of all in his works of charity. It was, therefore, fitting that he should have been called to the See of Ascoli by Pius IX. in June, 1876. In the year following he became Archbishop of Fermo, and the present Sovereign Pontiff honored him with the Roman purple on January 10th, 1893. After his death his body was exposed in the great hall of the Episcopio, as the episcopal palace is called. The students of the Seminary of Fermo acted as a guard of honor, and Masses were celebrated at three altars. The carabinieri and civic guards regulated the circulation of the crowds who came to pay the last fond tribute to a devoted pastor.

It is frequently asserted in Italy that an elector can often get five or ten francs for his vote—indeed, one of the candidates for a Roman constituency at the last general elections (I am speaking from the testimony of one who saw and heard the offer made and accepted) was willing to pay as much as twenty francs for every vote. To quote again from the testimony of those immediately concerned, a few days before the same elections, a caposettore or chief of a section in the Ministry of Posts and Telegraphs called up each of the implegati (employees) subject to him, and with mild eloquence suggested the desirability, from their own point of view, of going down and giving their support by voting for the best of Governments, observing that otherwise they might find themselves without employment. Some of the employees belonging to provincial towns remarked upon the expense which they would incur by going to vote at their native places. They were then given a free pass (second class) on the railroad and thirty francs in money as a mark of good-will on the part of the Government. To one who objected that this sum was insufficient, forty francs were given. These sums were included in the Budget of the Ministry of Public Works under the heading of extra expenses.

Last week the Don Chisciotte and the Secolo simultaneously issued a special supplement containing Cavallotti's revelations about Crispi.

The Secolo and Don Chisciotte are always said to be the only two Italian journals of importance that never receive benefits from the secret fund. They are the leading and powerful organs of the Extreme Left. When at times the Secolo has published revelations of a damning nature the Government officials have bought up all the copies of the paper. On Saturday precautions were taken against this extraordinary measure of the police, and the provincial distributors of the paper came to Milan to receive them in person, so that on Sunday all who wished might read. The revelations take the form of a letter. Cavallotti accuses Crispi (1) of casting off his lawful wife after twenty-five years of married life, and of forbidding her to bear his name; (2) of false witness and of using illegal pressure with regard to the Roman bank; (3) of presenting falsified documents to the Chamber in connection with the revolt in Sicily; (4) of incitement to and complicity in tale-brood; (5) of collusion with those interested in preventing an enquiry into the state of the Roman bank, and of accepting twenty thousand francs from Tanno (Governor of the Bank) within less than four days after his speech in the Chamber by which he had averted an enquiry; and (6) of obtaining the Grand Cordon of the Order of Saints Maurice and Lazarus for Cornelius Herz, who had bribed him with fifty thousand francs. Other revelations in the same letter show Crispi to have sought employment under the Sicilian Bourbons, the bete noire of Liberalism, and of having written as a journalist in their defence, of apathy in the insurrectionary movement in Calabria and Sicily, etc. These last accusations tend rather to throw ridicule upon Crispi than to do much serious damage. They are the sins of his youth and their gravity is not in any way comparable to the misdeeds of a hoary criminal. His intentions in seeking employment under the Bourbons are not known, and may have been compatible with revolutionary convictions, for cruples about simplicity of intention were the last which troubled the conscience of the unifiers of Italy. His praise of the Bourbons may be taken as relative, and as dictated by the guiding principle of the revolution, to hatch the Republic out of the egg of the Monarchy, and, as at Rome in the early days of Pius IX., to accept every concession made clamoring for more, and utilizing the reigning Sovereign as a cat paw. So far Signor Crispi has maintained absolute silence, having refused to answer the charges. "My honor is beyond all such attacks," is his only reply.

PATRICK RYAN.

The Sisters of Mercy.

The Catholic publishing house of P. O'Shea announces that the fourth and last volume of "Leaves From the Annals of the Sisters of Mercy," with a very full index of the complete work, will be ready on the Feast of Our Lady of Mercy, September 24. We are assured that the fourth volume of the "Leaves From the Annals of the Sisters of Mercy" is beyond all question the most interesting, and in many respects the most valuable contribution that has yet been made to the history of the Church in America. The facts and incidents connected with the various foundations of the Sisters of Mercy are presented with such incomparable literary skill that every page affords more interesting reading than the pages of the most fascinating novel. Even those most intimately acquainted with the history of the Church on this Continent will be surprised and delighted as they read the narratives of heroism and self-denial which mark the various foundations of the Sisters of Mercy in North and South America.

How Times Have Changed.

James R. Randall, the well known southern poet, writing from Augusta Ga., says: "No less a person than the Honorable A. H. Stephens told me that when he was a boy his mind had been so terrified by tales about Catholics as to affect him seriously. He ventured to enter the old Catholic church of this city... and when the organ began to play he was frightened lest, as he said, devils might issue forth. Little did he imagine then that he would, in after time, help demolish the Know-nothing demon, with his truth, daring and eloquence; that his brother would marry a Catholic; that two of his nieces would enter a convent, and a brilliant nephew named after him, I believe, study for the priesthood."

To Subscribers. BOTH OLD AND NEW.
