The awkwardness of country youths when they visit the cities has long been a subject for ridicule by city residents But in the practical education which boy or girl has the advantage. Prof. O. Stenley Hall of Clark University recently questioned some 6-year-old city children with very surprising results. Porty-five per cant, or nearly one-bell; had never been in the country. Trenty per cent did not know that milk ecfrom cows. Forestern per cent, or one of wood were made from trees. All those things and thousands more the country boy or girl learns unconsciously. It is this useful information which tends to give a practical character to the ideas of country-bred men and women. They realise most fully that he who has his foot on the soil has the foundation that is least likely to be shakes when storms and termests arise.
