The line of march was up Lake street to Main, and counter-marched to St. Peter's parochial residence, where the bishop made a brief address, thanking the people for their kind reception, after which there was quite a display of fireworks and the band played a number of selections which were very well executed. On Wednesday morning, at 8 o'clock, Holy Communion was given, and at 10:30 solemn high mass was celebrated, followed by the confirmation service. The class numbered about 90 members. The bishop made a brief address in which he explained in a most interesting manner the meaning of confirmation and what was expected of those who received the sacrament. PICKPOCKET KING.

EUROPE'S MOST ELEGANT CRIMINAL DIES MISERABLY.

An Accomplished Rogue Who Lived a Frivolous Life in Paris on the Proceeds of His Dexterous Picking—Some Wonderful Feats Performed.

Fred, the king of European pickpockets, is dead, and, as a king surely deserves an obituary notice, here is Fred's.

At the start a grave difficulty confronts us. Thousands in every European capital knew Fred, but no one seems to have known aught as to his parentage or as to the events of his earlier years. He was known simply as "Fred," and no one ever thought of questioning him as to his antecedents. An ordinary pickpocket may have to undergo many a crucial cross-examination; a king of pickpockets is rarely subjected to such an ordeal.

Fred first appeared in Paris early in the eighties, and in a short time he was one of the most conspicuous figures on the race courses and at all other fashionable pleasure resorts near the capital. His advice was eagerly sought by racegoers, and his "tips" were regarded as of considerable value. As a rule, he was successful in betting, and after a good day he squandered his money like a lord.

An elegant gentleman he seemed, and no one had the slightest suspicion that he was a thief. Tall, dark and slim, with black eyes, and a carefully trimmed mustache, he looked every inch the idle, wealthy man about town. He dressed in the latest fashion, with a gardenia in his buttonhole, and he invariably wore spotless pearl gray gloves. These gloves never left him, not even when he thrust his hand into some one's pocket. He possessed, indeed the skill of a prodigious juggler. The pearl gray gloves did not hinder him in the slightest degree; on the contrary, they helped him, for no one would think of making a charge against an elegant gentleman who habitually wore such faultless gloves.

Fred's life in Paris was that of a dandy. His home was in a hotel near the St. Lazare station, and from it he would issue in the morning and drive or stroll slowly to the station. There, he would mingle with the crowd, and when the train had come in, and in nine cases out of ten he managed to pilfer two or three well filled pocketbooks from the passengers. With these he would return to his hotel, and then, after carefully attiring himself, he would spend the rest of the afternoon in visiting friends, among whom were some of the best known men and women in Paris.

The afternoon would be spent at the race courses, and there this fine dandy obtained his best plunder, hardly a day passing that he did not relieve some one of his purses. In the evening he usually went to some theater or cafe chantant, and after the performance his rule was to invite a few friends of both sexes to supper. Royally he lived while his reign lasted.

His evil days began during the Exposition of 1889. Fred fell, for the first time into the hands of the police. It was at the Vincennes race track. He had stolen a large sum of money from an officer, and, unfortunately for him, a lady had seen the theft. Fred knew that her eyes were upon him as he thrust his hand into the officer's pocket, and he sought to save himself, he stepped up to the officer, and handing him his purses, said, most politely:—"Here, sir, you have lost some money." The officer stammered his thanks, but the lady raised an alarm, and Fred was arrested and taken off to jail. For this offence he was sentenced to two years' imprisonment.

This closed his career in Paris, and for the next few years he confined his operations to Nice, Monte Carlo, and other fashionable pleasure resorts. He continued to pick pockets as of old, and he was several times arrested and imprisoned. Finally he left France and settled down in London. There, the story goes, he once robbed the Prince of Wales, the incident occurring at Epsom, while his Royal Highness was intently watching a race.

He tried to rob the late Baron Hirsch on one of the English race courses, but the Baron, who had known him in Paris, whispered, with a smile, "My dear Fred, you have come too late. I have just lost all my money on the favorite, I was sure it would win, whereas it came in last. Come some other day before the race begins." "All right," replied Fred, coolly, lifting his hat with all his old time politeness and again mingling with the crowd.

Fred's last days were very mournful, and he was poverty stricken when death came to him at last in a miserable London garret. The joyous days of his early manhood, when he lived like a king in Paris, were eyes present to him, and to the last he never forgot that he had once been the boon companion of gentlemen and ladies.

Phantasie's Pest. A few years ago E. S. Howland, of Mount Morris, N. Y., who enjoys the distinction of having married August Belmont's daughter and who is personally a man of independent means introduced Mongolian pheasants in that section. A law was passed which forbids their being killed until 1900. The pheasants have multiplied to such an extent that they have become as much of a pest in that section as the English sparrow used to be in Buffalo.

Antwerp's Horse Butchering. Statistics show that in Antwerp alone nearly 4,000 horses were slaughtered last year for human consumption, and the number of shops dealing exclusively in horseflesh in the Belgian ports exceeds thirty.

A Timely Friend. With perfect propriety may we call that excellent remedy, Salvation Oil, a timely friend. This liniment rapidly cures rheumatism, neuralgia and pains when other remedies fail. Mr. Jno. M. Hall, Ashland, Va., writes: "I suffered with rheumatism in the ankle and the muscles connected therewith. Salvation Oil at once relieved the soreness, reduced the swelling and banished the pain. No other liniment that I used did me so much good."
