A MOTHER'S CURSE.

The Drove's Locomotive Fireman to an Awful Death.

Joseph Williams, fireman on the Northern Pacific coast passenger train, on a moment of insanity threw himself Minto the firebox of his locomotive and was instantly burned to death. I The frightful manner in which Williams ended his life brings to light the fact that he was the victim of a woman's curse. It is stated by rail-R road men that the fireman was runming the switch engine in the Mandan rards at the time a young girl was run down and crippled for life. She subrequently came into prominence through the appeals of her friends for postage stamps with which to enable ther to procure artificial limbs. The emother of the girl, who appeared in the yard very shortly after the accident, assalled the young fireman with the language at her command, and zinally wound up with:

May the God above you, that loves yany girl, end your days in the firebox wol your own engine!" This was several years ago, but the words rang in the ears of the man who executly leaved into the furnace to his edeath. He could not forget the words; ther were with him constantly. He recemed to hear them repeated every moment, and it was the mother's curse that finally drove him to take his tite it was an irresistible impulse that came over him on that fatal sussmine when he was on duty in the succession when he was on duty in the succession in the blaze a fascination alled alles to make his dring

TWILIGHT.

Low, sing low, true heart, sing low. The song that long ago we knew; Sing it softly, sweet and low, As long ago you used to do.

Now, though evening shadows fall, True hearts need not droop or sigh; Love and faith can lighten all-Twilight gray or midnight sky.

Clear, sing clear, dear heart, sing clear The song we loved at morning tide! Though our morn has faded, dear, Yetstill does morning love abide.

THE RUBY HEART

Aunt Jessica had been round the world more than once. She had been what is vulgarly called a "globe-trotter." in her day she had collected many rare and curious and beautiful things, but now she was an old woman ! and her time was come to die in the great, silent house, filled with the furniture that had belonged to Aunt Jessica's forbears many score years ago, and enriched by the spoils of many lands, brought home by the energetic hands of Aunt Jessica herself.

There was one treasure above all that I coveted, and that I would have sold my soul to have had for my ownmy Cousin Edith.

As for the money, well, I am not more disinterested than most people; but I would rather have had Edith without a penny than all Aunt Jessica's money without Edith. William and Bertram and I were sitting in the dining-room. Edith was above, helping poor aunt in the hard work of dying. Three raps came on the floor. We knew they were a sigaund had asked for us, and up we went.

"I have left everything divided among you four," she said. "and the ruby heart is to go to whichever of you three boys can find it." She spoke

I remembered the jolly old days when she used to come and see us at school and tip us, and I wished that death and time could have been more merciful. She went on

"You know it has a charm to make you happy in your love. It would have good men on both nickets, and no doubt made me happy, but he died, and it hadn't a chance to do its work, and now my time's come-it has been Edith came in.

"Do you care so very much for the nuby heart?" said she.

"I confess I should like to find it," answered.

Shan I help you to rook? She pulled out a book or two from the shelves in an aimless, desultory

"It's very supshiny out of doors don't you think?"

So we went on the river. The next day I began to look for the neart again. Edith sent her duennacompanion (who had once been her governess) to ask me if I did not think it would be nice to drive. Of course, I said I thought it would, and off we wen t.

That evening she asked Bertram and William if they would like to come out next day to see some ruins. "Thanks," said Bertram, "but I think my first duty to my poor aunt's memory is to find that heart" "Besides," said William, who never had much sentiment. like Bertram, "But you'll come, Wilfred?" she said, looking at me with her soft gray eyes. "Of course," I answered. Bertram and William scowled at me.

They would have given their ears, their lives, anything, in short, but their chances of a ruby heart worth thousands of pounds, for the privilege that was to be mine to-morrow.

To be in love with Cousin Edith was

"I don't know," she said, looking at me with her eyes wide open; "but I don't think you will find it there, because Bertram has been through that three times already. Did you ever eat strawberries before breakfast and gather them yourself?"

So we went into the kitchen garden and ate strawberries till the gong rang for breakfast, Bertram and William were getting quite sulky and savage from the non-success of their search, and the little time I had devoted to it annoyed them.

"I believe," said Bertram, with an air, of gayety, a little overdone, "that Wilfrid thinks he knows where the heart is, and that he can put his hand on it at any moment'

"I wish I could," I said.

"So do I," said Edith, almost in the same breath. "You wish Wilfrid to find the heart!" said William. "Why?" "Oh, no. I don't mean Wilfrid; I meant at least Well, we shall all be glad when it's settled one way or the
