If the late Dr. Muller of Vienna was at fault in introducing the plague bacilli into that city, he was none the less a brave and a good man. Death had no terrors for him. His devotion to medical science was such that while consciousness remained he marked and described each successive symptom of his illness. The circumstances connected with his reception of the Holy Viaticum were painfully touching. The priest who attended him was not allowed to enter the room, and describes the scene as follows: "I stood at a closed window, near which was placed the bed of the dying man. We saw each other eye to eye and my voice reached his ear. The patient was well disposed for absolution, and one of the Sister of Meroy at his bed ide carried to him the Has to the oor-poral, which I had laid upon the win dow sill of a neighboring room, and he be to charasting the handsome alier to administer the same and pictures with the bare to administer the source oli."
