Lace and Embroidery—The Uses of the Tes

whether the grip is accountable for pleting touch of boudoir grace. the tea robe. Certainly there seldom has been a time when so many of us shall be sightly. A formal caller by mistake may be ushered in while one practices at the piane. And whatever would perish of chagrin if discovered in an unbecoming negligee. Thus the tea gown has become, and more particularly lately, something other than a robe in which to sip tea late in the afternoon between the doffing of visiting and the donning of dinner dress. Lacey, silk, linen or beribboned negligees are known as "robes d'interieur," 'morning gowns," "breakfast robes. 'tea coats," "tea jackets," "peignoirs, 'matinees," and so on. Some women have enough originality to think up special terms for their lounging gowns. And the further removed from the notion "wrapper" the less a woman minds being found in her loose garment of lace and ribbon.

For the Summer. The organdles this year as usual are exquisite. Large floral designs are especially effective and much used. They come in huge trails of wistaria, masses of wild roses, dogwood blossoms, all in dainty shades of green, pink and brown. The illustration shows a gown of the large patterned organdy, combined wih a plain color. The Reposing Robe.

This reposing robe may be made without a scrap either of ribbon or of lace. No mode is in greater favor than that of the Japanese kimono, especially those handsomely embroidered in gayest butterflies. The kimono is a model, too, which is used for dressing jackets of domestic make. Cut off just at the hips, loose back and front, and made with flowing sleeves, the kimono jacket from Japanese or foulard silk, outlined altogether with a threeinch band of white wash silk, makes a simple and becoming little wrap. In Chronicle. its Japanese effect it is especially good when worn by women of dark hair and modified pompadour. For they themselves suggest the Japanese women in appearance. What, then, more natural than the adoption of their dress? A certain dealer makes a specwith our house robes. Indeed, there is no limit to possible extravagances, when a princess underskirt of cobweb linen is finely plaited to fit at the waist and hips, then decorated further with appliques and frills of handwrought Valenciennes lace in floral pattern. Such a garment is equally desirable to wear with a gorgeous ball gown or elaborate breakfast overdress of lace-if one may afford it for either or both purposes.

Lingerie, Negligees. As has been said of lingeries, negligees, which women would have put aside a few years ago as overtrimmed, are favored by those of best taste. Indeed, one finds fastidious matrons spending their earlier morning hours in thin fragile robes oftener than in costumes of which the shirt waist has any part. There is no occasion for apology if a feminine friend comes in and finds one wearing composedly a pretty resting jacket which comes only to the hips, concealing not at all an attractive petticoat of silk or linen, even prettily trimmed cotton.

Low neck, or half low, is excellent style in a house gown. A lovely thing from pongee silk in a creamy tintmore costly sorts are creamy in colorings—has embroideries in the rich Oriental hues on the loose waist and elbow sleeves. The pointed low neck pretends to close with cords of old blue silk. The wide girdle and sash are of dull green liberty satin. A scarf of the creamy pongee silk is a grace-ful portion of this adorable little bodice. But it requires much skill in managing effectively, and many be put aside as part in a time when women had more leisure for thinking of the pose

The sleeves of this pretty affair are box-plaited first, then the plaits are sewed down finely and firmly. The pussycat worn with this luxurious garment is of tawny yellow and black striped. No gray feline friend need hope to be the pet of a mistress who loves yellow hues. Tiger combinations only need apply. Tea jackets, even tea coats, are extreme novelties of a period wherein some variation of this dressy garment is indispensable to the wardrobe of even ordinary use, Tea coats are longish garments, modeled much after the automobile cloak of recent great and now passing vogue. The tea coat's lease of life will be longer than was that of the automobile wrap. Being worn only in private. the public eye has no opportunity to weary of its peculiar charm.
