

The Jobbernowis went out one day, with pencils and with paper, Resolved to sketch most soberly without a single caper. An artist kind to coach the seven had graciously consented; With jokings or with tricks they knew he would be discontented. Their easels, colors, bags of lunch, they placed beneath the trees And tried their best to picture well the flowers, birds and bees. You would not think those sketches fac that graced each birchen sheet, But they were all, like Beas, inclined to think them "awful sweet,"

Their teacher, though, thought differently. He criticised them all in such a way each scholar felt uncemfertably small. "Your celer's wrong," he said to Pat, "That sky is much tee green," Marie, you have no soul for art. You lack the smallest tastel" "Ne, Hans, I need not say a word; of time 'twould be a waste!" "Ah, Tess, your lines and colors both suggest a nightmare ill." To Wong and Ole, "Sirs, I fear your breek can't run up hill,"

The Jobbernowls indignant were to hear their work thus chided And well to pay their critic up was each of them decided. Their anger made them all forget the artist was a stranger, The guest of worthy Master Chips, and that there might be danger If they forgot their manners much, to Chips at school next day A very painful penalty they'd all be made to pay. But up they picked their easels, and they flung them at his head, Then chased that painter manikin until he shricked with dread.

TO-DAY'S LOVE STORY. A Means to an End.

A man was beeting an impatient tat too on the Bolton doorstep as Emily answered his ring.

"I've called for the rent," he said. "Pray don't apologize," she interrupted, closing the door half an inch. His mouth contracted as he took the hint instantly, but with a bad grace. "Oh, very well, if you don't mind, I don't," he replied shortly, as he walked down the steps. "Good afternoon." A few days later John Burrell stood on the doorstep of No. 4 Norton Villa. with two companions, one of whom was a sheriff, who put his foot in the doorway immediately it was opened by Emily Bolton.

"Can I speak to you for a moment?" he asked her suddenly. She led the way silently into a sitting

"Will you listen to what I have to say? It is simply this: If you can get the rent together in a week or a little longer, I will take my man with me; only you must give me your promise that the furniture will not be removed in the meantime." She turned away, her shoulders shak.

'I wish you'd go," she said—the tears were in her voice now. "I don't want

He left the room quietly, and dismissed his companions. Then he listened stealthily outside the door until her sobs had cerred. That afternoon some one commenced to practice singing in the adjoining room, and he had no difficulty in identilying the voice as Emily Bolton's.

Presently he crept into the hall to listen. Their door was slightly ajar, and during the intervals of singing from the different voices audible it was evident that some of the family were

"Thank you," she said quite seriously. Next day he returned to the house.

"We have sent the rent," she began haughtily.

"Yes, thank you," he said meekly. "I have come with the receipt—that is, may I see your sister for a moment?" "I don't know, I'm sure. She's busy, packing."

His heart sank. She was going away,

"Only a minute," he urged. She ushered him unwillingly into the room he had so lately occupied in an official capacity, and then called her left her face. "Tell me, and I'll see," she said shyly.

He flung forward and seized her hands. Her resistance was only halfhearted, and he successfully carried the outposts, and within five minutes she had unconditionally surrendered.

The same evening the manager the Eolian Opera Company received note from the lady whom he had engaged to go on tour as his principal contralto, intimating that unforeseen circumstances would prevent her fulfilling the engagement. She therefore returned him the three months' saiary he had considerately advanced.

Pin Money.

People talk about "pin money" at the present day somewhat vaguely, but the exact significance of the expression in a woman's allowance from her husband or father for her strictly personal expenditure. The origin of the term is this: Long after the divention of pins, in the fourteenth century, the maker was allowed to sell them openly on the pins with money provided by their husbands or fathers. After pins became plentiful and cheap, pin money remained in vogue, though little of it was spent on pins. It is often, but er-Catherine Howard, the fifth wife of Henry VIII.
