GIFTED AUTHORESS.

MISS KATHERINE E. CONWAY OF THE BOSTON PILOT HERE.

A Rochesterian Who has Reaped Marked Successes in Journalistic and Literary Fields—Her New Novel to Appear in October—A Rest.

Miss Katherine E. Conway, of Boston, associate editor of the Boston "Pilot" and author of several novels, is at Nazareth convent in this city, where she will rest for two weeks. Miss Conway is a Rochesterian. Her father was a prominent contractor in the city's earlier days and the family owned a large residence on Lake avenue, not far from Lyell avenue. An elder sister of Miss Conway's is the head of a successful woman's college in Buenos Ayres, in South America. Katherine Conway was carefully reared and educated. She attended the Sacred Heart convent, on Prince street, and then went to St. Mary's academy, in Buffalo. While there, at the age of 15, she did her first writing, verses that appeared in one of the local papers. Monsignor DeReggio, chancellor of the diocese of Rochester, possesses a file of the "West End Journal," in which was reproduced Miss Conway's first published poem. After she graduated Miss Conway worked for a few months on the Buffalo "Catholic Union" now the "Union and Times," after which she sought a position on the Boston "Pilot," then in charge of that prince of Irish journalists, John Boyle O'Reilly.

Although there were often difficulties and drawbacks—in those days women were not appreciated in journalism—Miss Conway struggled bravely on, encouraged and cheered by Mr. O'Reilly's help. To-day Miss Conway is a recognized factor in New England's exclusive literary circle.

While Miss Conway has done considerable work outside of her journalistic lines, it is as associate editor of the Boston "Pilot" that she finds her life work. The "Pilot" is one of the oldest Irish-American Catholic weeklies in the United States. It was founded by the late Patrick Donahoe, and for years was the only paper of its kind in the country. To-day it is widely read, despite the fact that nearly every diocese has its own Catholic paper. Miss Conway started work on the "Pilot" under John Boyle O'Reilly and has continued under James Jeffrey Roche. Tempting offers from other publications have not availed to entice her from the papers where she really began her journalistic career.

Among Miss Conway's works a popular series is called the "Family Sitting Room Books." They include "A Lady and Her Letters," "Making Friends and Keeping Them," "Questions of Honor," and "Bettering Ourselves." A novel from her pen is "The Way of the World and Other Ways." In October she will issue a novel entitled "Lalor's Maples a story in which Rochester figures considerably. In "New Footprints in Well Trodden Ways" Miss Conway describes her impressions of several of the continental countries. Her poems have been collected and published in "A Dream of Lilies." Another volume of her verses will come out soon. She has also published "Watchwords from John Boyle O'Reilly."

Miss Conway has changed but little in recent years except that her bearing is a trifle more matronly. Her countenance bears the serene look of one who has learned the secret of extracting as much pleasure from life as is possible under the cares of a busy life.

"It is so good to be back in Rochester," said Miss Conway. "At times I really grow hungry for a sight of my native place and I must come here and get a glimpse of the old city. It has not changed so much except that it has grown larger. So far as beauty is concerned it has not changed a particle and is still one of the most beautiful spots in the world."

"No, I shall not do any work while in Rochester," said Miss Conway. "I shall rest here for two weeks, only seeing my old friends and drinking in the beauty of the city."
