A BRILLIANT CARRIER.

A Beautiful Catholic Story Written For The Catholic Journal.
BY MARY BOWENA COTTER.

CHAPTER IV.

"Thanks for your compliment, but you overestimate the value of my singing for I am far from perfect."

"No, you are not, but tell me where did you get acquainted with the music?"

"I never met any of these Sisters until I came here—but I feel quite at home with them as I spent seven years in a convent boarding school."

"You," said Beatrice in amazement. "You are not a Catholic, are you?"

"Certainly," was the reply.

"And you never told me before, Helen smiled and said, "I have had no occasion to tell you."

Beatrice was silent for in Helen she had found all that seemed most noble in young womanhood and she had often been puzzled to know from whence that secret charm proceeded. She remembered how her friend accompanied by her aunts, had come to church on the two preceding Sundays when most of the boarders had thought it too warm to leave the cottage excepting for a row on the lake, and she had admired them for the good example they had shown—but had felt no inclination to follow them or to enquire to which church they had gone. It was she who first broke the silence by saying:

"Helen, do you really believe in the Catholic religion?"

"Certainly, why do you ask?"

"Because it seems to me that any one as well educated as yourself could not believe in a religion full of horrors."

"What do you mean? I do not comprehend you."

"Oh, confession, for one thing. It seems dreadful to be obliged to tell all of your sins to a man who is no better than yourself. You do not do it, do you?"

"I do."

"How can you, Helen, I would not have believed it of you."

"It is far easier than you may believe, for by the grace of God we think of Him who sent us priests to teach us the way to Heaven rather than the men themselves."

"And there, too, are the dungeons and terrible punishments in the convents such as I read about in Marmon. You must know all about it you spent seven years in a convent."

"It is all false, for I have been long enough with the Sisters to know them well, and I know, too, that many lies have been told about them by their enemies who too blinded by their own vices to be able to understand the purity of their holy lives."

"But you were not in a nunnery. It is different there and in Europe, too, they may be more strict than in our enlightened America."

"Who told you so?"

"Mamma did; and she has travelled and studied a great deal, so she knows all about it."

Helen would willingly have spent hours in trying to convince her young friend of the truth but she saw too plainly how her bright intellect had been poisoned and she felt that she could only pray for her.

CHAPTER V.

In this enlightened age and country of ours the picture of Beatrice Snow may apparently be overdrawn, or many may be inclined to censure her for her darkened views of the Catholic Faith, but do not be too hasty, dear reader, in your judgment. There are, alas, very many like her among the educated and enlightened youth of our free country who need our charity far more than our ill-will. When bigoted and narrow minded historians and other writers have sought to win their own fortune and popularity by putting before the public appalling, bitter, falsified stories in regard to the Catholic religion and the fairest lights of the church, who can blame the public for their darkened views. Worse still these books are placed not only in public libraries but are put into the hands of our innocent children in school which Catholics are obliged to help support and are too often taught them by loving parents who believe themselves to be most trusty protectors of the morals of their children.

During the remainder of the afternoon Beatrice could talk of nothing but her reception and much time was spent in making her toilette. Her young heart thrilled with joy, and in spirit, she was for to-night, the gay society lady she hoped to become after finishing her education.
