A BRILLIANT CAREER.
 A Beautiful Catholic Story Written For The Catholic Journal.
 BY MARY ROWENA COTTER.
 CHAPTER VIII.
 The lover alone lived, but when he came to claim her, she had forgotten her promises and spurned him because he had lost a limb and she was unwilling to bind herself for life to a cripple. She disposed of her property at a fair price and with the declaration that she North, which had robbed her of so much owed her a living, she turned her steps in that direction traveling until she found just the place she wanted to build her seminary, where she hoped to recover her lost fortune.
 The place first selected was a grand old mansion standing on the brow of a hill which commanded a broad view of the surrounding country. The old style house was quite plain, but seemed large enough for a palace, and the grounds were what attracted her. The mansion was a masterpiece of architecture, the old stone walls of the house were neatly covered with ivy and the fact that it stood on the edge of a forest which had been changed into a pretty park made the scene very picturesque.
 "This is just the place I want," she said to Laura Dale, a young companion who was to enter upon her work with her, "but I am afraid I have not enough money to buy it."
 "I am afraid not," was the muttered comment of a workman who had overheard the remark. "They might as well think of buying the Capitol at Washington as to think of turning old O'Connell out of his home."
 Hearing him out they passed on up the long flight of stone steps to the front door where they stood for a time perfectly enraptured with the beauty of the expanse of mountain scenery before them.
 "Just what I want," said Julia again who knew that Mr. O'Connell occupied the mansion alone with his servants, "and we must have it even if we have to pay a heavy mortgage upon it and put for it to our pupils board and tuition money, but I am sure we can get it cheap as the old man ought to be glad enough to get out of the place."
 The man, who still cherished the memories of two lovely daughters as well as a fair young wife who had rested in their graves for many long years, received them most kindly and showed them nearly every room excepting a law once occupied by the dear ones which were consecrated to the eyes of strangers to behold. In the tower which he called his observatory, from the fact that it commanded a most extensive view of the country on all sides for miles around, he left them saying:
 "If you will excuse me for a few minutes, I will go down and get to spy glass so that you can get a better view. The sunsets from here are glorious and if you do not object to remaining a couple of hours in this old house you may have the pleasure of seeing a picture far more beautiful than any artist could ever paint."
 "We shall be so happy," exclaimed both young ladies in one voice.
 Ever happy in the presence of young people, the old man tripped down the dusty winding stairs with the elasticity of youth and as soon as they knew him to be beyond the sound of their voices Laura said:
 "What do you think of the old house Julia?"
 "Very romantic, and I dare say there is a history connected with it. Just what I want, and I must have it though some of the rooms are quite musty. I think a little sunlight and fresh air will fix that all right, but Laura, did you notice anything about the old paintings, she added cautiously.
 "No. What do you mean?"
 "I noticed there were several pictures of Mary and the Catholic saints and from the reverence with which the old man regarded them he is a Papist."
 "I hope not, as I do not care to have any more to do with those Catholics than is necessary, but all we want is to get possession of the house and then we can soon remove every vestige of Popery if it is not done before."
 By this time their host had returned with the glasses and was soon followed by a servant who served them a light luncheon.
 "This," he said pointing to a little alcove hewn out of the solid rock on the hillside in the distance, "is one of the dearest spots in my whole estate."
 Both girls adjusted their glasses and beheld what they could not have distinguished with the naked eye a rustic shrine of the Blessed Virgin decorated with wild flowers and ivy. They exchanged meaning glances, but he was too intent in telling them how this had been built under the direction of his cherished and long departed wife, to notice them. For the time he seemed to be under the impression that he was talking to Catholics, and his listeners allowed him to proceed without comment.

 After witnessing the glorious sunset they went down stairs and their host, telling them how much he enjoyed their visit was about to dismiss them with a cordial invitation to call again, when Miss Van Horn stated that she wished to speak to him on a little business.
 "Certainly, ladies," he said smiling "if you do not object, we will sit here on the veranda as it is cooler and pleasanter than in the parlor."
 In the most forcible words that the florid southern tongue could command Julia told of their plans for establishing a school for the Christian and social education of young ladies, and the old man's face glowed at such enthusiasm in one so young, until she told him that she wanted his home for that purpose, then his countenance changed to sadness.
 "I have lived here for many years, here I brought my bride in early youth, here my children were born, here all that was dear to me have passed away and in this same house I shall die." His voice was impressively sad and tears stood in his faded blue eyes, but she, the wilful girl who never wished to be denied anything, could not refrain from saying:
 "My dear Mr. O'Connell, can you not let us have this beautiful place to be used for the pure Christian education of young ladies who are perhaps as dear to their parents as your living daughters were to you?"
 His heart for the moment was strangely touched by this new idea, not that he intended giving up his home, for he could never do that, but he said, "You speak of Christian education, may I ask what faith you profess to believe in?"
 "Certainly," was the proud reply. "We are members of the Church of England."
 "Followers of Henry VIII., are you?" Well, you haven't asked me my religion, but I will tell you, I am a member of the Church of Rome, and dear as my home is to me I would light the torch that would reduce it to a mass of charred ruins rather than give it to anyone who would teach nefarious lies against my religion within its walls. You may go now, ladies, and perhaps you may live to see your suggestion carried out in regard to using my home as a place for the Christian education of youth, but never in the reuse in which you have spoken."
 Mr. O'Connell was, in truth, a man of gentle loving disposition and one who had a rare charm in entertaining strangers, but he was very sensitive in regard to all that was dearest to him, and now from his kind cordiality he had fallen into a state bordering on sullen sadness, so the disappointed young ladies were glad to make their escape.
 "The ugly old Papist can't live forever," ejaculated Julia, "and perhaps after he is dead we can easily get possession of the place."
 "And if we fail?"
 "As far as the old house is concerned it will not be much loss, for it is a musty old rockery and I dare say it is haunted by evil spirits."
 Unwilling to leave the vicinity, the ladies built their seminary in the valley just below, and financially and socially the enterprise was a great success, for many of their wealthy friends sent their daughters to them to be educated, while they in turn persuaded others to enter the school until in a few years it became very popular. What pleased them most was that for many miles around there was no other institution where the higher branches were taught, but a rival was to come. For fifteen years Mr. O'Connell lived in his hill top home above them and then the end came, and what must have been their surprise and indignation on learning that his entire estate, to which there were no natural heirs, had been willed to the bishop for the establishment of a young ladies' boarding school. It was not long ere the old house was transformed into a pleasant convent and soon on the grounds above them could be seen the black robed figures of the Sisters and groups of young girls who appeared to be as gentle and refined, it not more so, than their own.
 With a jealous eye Miss Van Horn, who would not, as she declared, degrade herself by even recognizing her new neighbors, watched them closely and she could scarcely suppress her indignation on learning that wealthy Protestants as well as Catholics were sending their daughters to St. Agnes' Academy. She would have gladly received any of them in her own school but as it was she strictly forbade any of her girls associating with them or going near the grounds of the Academy.
