Weather Bureau Report Used in Criminal Court.

The story of Abraham Lincoln's confounding an opposing witness with an almanac record of the moon's phases finds parallel in the case of Waterston recently acquitted on a charge of murder in an Iowa court. The main witness against him says the Chicago Times-Herald, was one Delafield, who swore he was working just outside the window of the accused on the day of the alleged crime, and saw Waterston open a cupboard, take down a bottle move about as if preparing a potion and then administer the draught to Mrs. Waterston, who died in great agony later in the day.

A lawyer named Bradford, for the defense, had asked the jurymen on examination of them as to competency if they had faith enough in the weather bureau reports to attach credence to them, and found every man on the panel believed the records were fair and reliable. The state had not understood the drift of these questions, but had not objected.

When it came to cross-examination Bradford asked the witness, Delafield what he was doing outside Waterston's window, and he said he was digging a cistern.

"When did you begin digging the cistern?"

"November 11, the day Mrs. Waterston died."

"How much did you dig that day?"

"Oh! about three feet."

"What tools did you use?"

"A shovel."

"And a pick?"

"No, the ground was mellow."

"Work in an overcoat?"

"No, my shirt-sleeves. The day was warm."

"Have any thing to drink?"

"Had a pair of water on the ground within reach."

"Didn't it freeze?"

"No." The witness smiled scornfully.

Then Bradford offered in evidence a certain copy of the weather bureau report for November 10 and 11, and below freezing the first day and below zero the day of the alleged crime.

The jury accepted the official document, and to that extent regarded the witness as impeached, for Waterston was acquitted.

Dog Steps Bicycle Riders.

There is a dog owned by a resident of Brighton that has been trained with skill, patience and diligence to pursue passing bicycle riders who are with out lamps.

This anti-bicycle dog is not ignorant of some of the tricks which in time past have made intelligent members of crowded thoroughfares waging his tail pleasantly evening he was along the crowded thoroughfare wagging his tail and giving many outward indications of forbearance and contentment.

Along comes a bicycle rider, male or female, intent upon keeping in the middle of the road and seeing free and clear from the ruts, depressions and breaks. The bicycle man or girl, so rarely unconscious of the proximity of the anti-bicycle dog, is speeding along when suddenly and without warning the dog rushes into the highway and begins with a loud barking and snarling to pursue the rider, making a circuit of the wheel and occasionally jumping at the pedals.

The male bicycle rider resents the intrusion of the anti-bicycle dog by scorching rapidly ahead of him, but some of the girl bicyclists are less prompt. They cease pedaling, and with an injured and aggrieved look expose talons with the dog.

"Go away!" is the usual expression of a female bicyclist when attacked by the anti-bicycle dog. Following this expression the wheel topples over and the dog departs for another victim.—Pearson's Weekly.

Lord Rosse's Nerve.

Lord Rosse, who lent the famous telescope that bears his name, was an expert mechanic, and was also some what careless about his dress. One occasion the earl was looking through the engine-room of a large manufactory. He suddenly became much interested in something he saw, and looked apprehensive. The engineer came up.

"Well, what's up?" he growled. "What are you shaking your head and looking at your watch for? What have you got to find fault with?"

"Oh," answered Lord Rosse, "I'm no finding any fault. I am just waiting till the boiler explodes."

"Till the boiler explodes? Why you're crazy, man! You'll have to go out of here."

"Well," said the earl, "if you work ten minutes longer with that screw loose there, the boiler certainly will explode."

The engineer looked at the screw indicated by his rough visitor. He jumped at the screw, and fastened it as soon as he could.

"Why didn't you say that sooner?" he demanded.

"Why should I?" answered Lord Rosse. "I never yet have had an opportunity to see a boiler explode!"

Opportunity of a Lifetime. He had called for the answer she had promised to give him, but she looked at him half doubtingly.

TRIE VAMPIRE.

The Bicycle Must Go If You Can't Pay Your Installments.

She looks at him with pleading, tear-bedimmed eyes. "Have pity!" she begs. "Do not ask me for any more money. You know I haven't any."

"I must have it!" he answers briefly.

"Wretch!" she exclaims indignantly, scarce knowing what she says. "Is there no mercy in your heart? It is all your fault! It was your honeyed words that got the better of my judgment. But for you I should never have—"

Burying her face in her hands, she sobs as though her heart would break. He makes no attempt at consolation. His manner betrays only impatience, as with face as hard as flint he waits for the violence of her grief to pass.

Presently she looks up, hastily dries her eyes, and from a drawer produces a pathetically lean pocket book. "Take this," she says, proffering a coin. "It is all I have."

"That don't go," he answers brutally. "I'm sorry, ma'am, but if you can't pay your installments when they're due we must take the bicycle away."

A Dangerous Precedent.

The great salt tears cisterns up in his eyes, and he clasped his hands imploringly.

"Mr. Police Commissioner," he cried, "oh, dear, good Mr. Police Commissioner, have mercy upon me! This pot for myself I make this plea, but for my wife, my children, who, if I lose my job on the force shall lack for food and the gorgeous raiment that they have been used to."

"We are deeply moved by your story," said the president of the board, "but in a case affecting the public welfare we cannot be influenced by personal desires. The offence to which you have pleaded guilty is so glaringly an infraction of police rules and regulations—so palpably a violation of official procedure, that your discharge is necessary in order that we may maintain discipline and preserve intact the fundamental principles of the police force. Better that ninety-nine innocent men should be arrested than one guilty man."

"Mercy!" pleaded the poor policeman, "mercy!" The party I arrested looked so innocent. How could I tell that he was a dangerous criminal?"

"That's it!" said the president. "You could not, and we want men that can."

His First Name.

Everybody knows Mr. Richard Harding Davis. And Richard knows all those worth knowing. The author of "Soldiers of Fortune" was employed on a local paper in a reporterial capacity some years ago. One day an extremely fresh young man joined the staff, and in three days he was addressing every man on the staff by his first name. That is, everybody but Davis. He entered the local room one afternoon where Davis was seated, and, slipping him familiarly on the shoulder, said:

"Hello, Davis! Say, what is your first name, anyhow?"

"Mister," replied Davis, quietly.

JOSEPH JEFFERSON, WHO HAS JUST BEGUN HIS SIXTIETH THEATRICAL SEASON.

Jefferson, who will play a few weeks this season, as usual, has been regularly on the stage for sixty years. His first appearance, however, goes further back, for that occurred seventy-one years ago, when he was a child of three. He is still bright eyed, alert and vigorous and devotes considerable time to his fads, fishing and painting.

CAPTAIN JOHN J. PERSHING, WHO HAS BEEN FIGHTING THE MOROS.

Captain John J. Pershing, who recently received the thanks of the secretary of war for crushing the rebellious Moro chiefs in Mindanao, entered the territory of the warlike dattos ready to shake hands or fight, but with an avowed preference for the former. His pacific overtures were accepted by a majority of the Moros, but a few dattos preferred fighting to friendship and were severely punished. Captain Pershing is a Chicagoan, a West Pointer and a veteran Indian fighter.
