A report on the Donegal quarries has been issued by S. G. Frazer, who made investigations at the request of E. Ernest Hart, the editor of the Home Beautiful. Mr Frazer sets out the conclusions of experts that an extensive area of seventy square miles will afford an inexhaustible supply of the finest material. Almost every type of granite, both as regards color and texture, is available. Material for every class of work can be easily and cheaply procured. The durability and soundness of the rock have stood thorough tests, and for polished work it has been found equal to the best Aberdeen or Peterhead stone. The facilities for quarrying leave nothing to be desired, and there is abundant local labor. On all sides the brightness, handiness and eagerness for work of the Donegal peasants are admitted. Here, it is pointed out, is a capital opportunity to develop a great industry, and Mr. Frazer estimates the income at $220,000, which would give a margin of profit of $20,000. P. Brannon, a practical engineer, has pronounced the Donegal granite the most enduring known.
