The members of the Leixlip branch of the Gaelic league have erected in Confey churchyard a beautiful Celtic cross to the memory of one of their members, James McGovern, who lost his life last summer in a brave attempt to save that of another. The double fatality which the cross commemorates occurred in the Ryewater river, at Distillery bridge, a little distance beyond Leixlip village. A young man, Matthew Fitzsimons, while employed washing sheep in the river, got beyond his depth, and James McGovern, who was on the bank, jumped in to his assistance. Caught round the body by the drowning lad, he was helpless to save himself, and both were drowned. They were members of the Gaelic league, and the local branch, assisted by the people of the neighborhood, determined to erect a cross to commemorate McGovern's heroism. Rev. Father Dooley accepted the position of honorable treasurer, and invitations for subscriptions met with generous response. The result is a monument very creditable to the people of | years. the district. The form of memorial chosen is Irish in every respect-design, material and workmanship.
