Chapter VIII

Father O'Connell

Groups of men and women were everywhere; on the road, in the doorways, and everywhere with the same melancholy and somewhat defiant expression of countenance. Gloomy determination looked from every brow, and a fierce animosity gleamed from every eye. The conversation was always in low tones, but it was accompanied at times by a bodiful shaking of the head, and a threatening gesture of the hands, which evinced how deep were the feelings of the speaker. All bowed respectfully to the priest and his companion, who, as the parish doctor, was well known, and ardently liked because of his sym-
