LESS COLLEGE TUTORING.

Dne Soure of Income for Clever Stu dents Cut Off by New Conditions.

Private tutoring no longer yields the rich harvest of former times to clever students in the universities and colleges of this town, says the New York Sun. The paimy days of the business vanished ten or fifteen years ago, when a student working his way through college could still earn from $1,000 and $2,500 a year, and when some men earned nearly twice me latter sum.

Even then, however, the business was not such a science as the "Widow" makes of it at Harvard. You may learn almost anything of the Widow that is taught in the university, and there are undergraduates who fervently believe that he (for the lization has been blazed by two agen-Widow is not a woman) knows more cies, the railroad and the town site of most subjects than the real proman says the Pittsburg Gazette. fessors
