The dramatic society of St. Mary's church presented the admirable comedy, "The Deacon" at Emerald hall, on Friday evening of this week to a crowded house, and was greatly enjoyed by all present. Each member of the cast rendered their part in good style and it was one continuous laugh from start to finish. After the entertainment dancing was enjoyed, Fagan's orchestra, Rochester, furnishing the music. Supper was served from 7:30 p. m. and after the

Baker Theater

Commencing Monday night, at the Baker Theatre, Vaughan Glaser and his company will offer one of the biggest successes that has ever been credited to anyone on any stage. The play is "Leah Kleschna", C. M. McFellan's powerful drama, which was Mrs. Fiske's vehicle for more than two seasons in New York. It is one which absorbs the interest of the audience, from the moment that the curtain rises on the scene of the master thief's lodgings until it falls on the exquisite lettuce field scene of the final act. The movement of the play is swift, incident follows incident with logical precision and the auditor is never in doubt as to the meaning of the story or mystified as to its psychology. The construction is almost flawless, the playwright has told a strong human story without so much as a waste word or an extraneous scene. The play moves to its inevitable ending with irresistible force and all the time dominating the emotions of the audience. There will be the usual matinees on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday. Monday night autographed photos of Frank Camp will be given as souvenirs to ladies purchasing seats down stairs.

Chapter IV
Father's High Hopes

"Well, I can't help it," pouted Moira. "Uncle won't let me receive you as a suitor, and not even for you, Tim Carmody, shall I say by my dear old uncle." She drew herself up, her air of willful firmness making her look prettier than ever to the enamored eyes of her lover.

"Nor would I ask you to, Moira darlin', but God is good, an' maybe He'd put pity for us both in yer uncle's heart, an' when he sees how sober an' shteady I am, maybe it's not always he'd be houldin' back his consent."

"I don't know about that," said Moira, shaking her pretty head, and directing one of her arch glances at Tighe.

"Na boshalish," said Tighe, "an' anyway, we'll not moind biddin' the devil good-morrow till we mate him, so kape up yer heart, Moira an' perhaps it'll all come roight yet!"

Moira with some affright remembered her errand. "And uncle told me to be so quick!" she said.

"Well, I can't help it," said Tighe, "an' I'll run alongside of you, an' we'll be there in no time."

"No, Tighe, I'll not let you take a foot with me—I'll go the quicker without you!" and without waiting for his answer she hurried on.

But Tighe would be true to his determination of accompanying her, and he followed, never suffering himself quite to overtake her, however, while Shaun, seeming equally impressed with the maneuver, followed directly behind his master. The procession was the same on the return, and to Moira's dismay, Father Meagher saw it from the window of his study, where he had been anxiously waiting the return of his niece.

"Well, as to that, my good fellow," said Father Meagher, "Do not attempt to excuse yourself, Moira," he said sternly, "I saw enough to give me all the facts."

"Well, but uncle, I wouldn't even let him come with me; he followed me himself, and Shaun followed him."

"And a pretty precious pair you are, both you and Tighe! Go to your work, miss!"

Moira obeyed, muttering when she had reached her own domain: "It's dreadful hard to be treated this way; but Tighe loves me, and I don't think he'd ever marry any one else, even if uncle never gave his consent."

Father Meagher and Clare were early astir next morning, and after some directions to young Father McShane, whose delicate health exempted him from regular duty, and some parting orders to Moira regarding any interviews she might be tempted to have with Tighe a Vohr, at which Moira privately laughed, knowing more about Tighe's intentions than did the worthy priest, the two departed. What was their astonishment when, having arrived in Dublin, and Father Meagher was about to engage a cab to take them to Father O'Connor and Nora, Tighe a Vohr and Shaun stood suddenly before them.

"Forgive me, yer riverince, for follin' you, but be roysen o' me anxiety about you all I couldn't shtay behoidin'. I've an inklin' some-way or another that this journey'll bring good to the young master, an' I kem on to know

Emmett DeVoy & Co., in the dramatic fantasy "Dreamland," will be one of the rich treats on the Cook Opera House bill next week. Mr. DeVoy has not been at the Cook in a long period of time, and it is thought that his act this season will be more enjoyable than anything he has ever appeared in. The Hassan Ben Ali troupe of whirlwind Arabs, from the desert of Sahara, will be the big acrobatic offering. In the monologue line Julius Tannen will have things all his own way, and it is believed he will be just as big a hit in his way as Nat Wills was in his. "A Shine Flirtation" is the offering of Bearice McKenzie and Walter Shannon, both of whom come to meet the new comers, but the vaudeville from the Alcazar Stock company, of San Francisco, the most famous stock organization on the Pacific coast. The Dillon brothers, "makers and repairers of songs," will be another excellent vaudeville act, as will Walter Schrode and Lizzie Mulvey, in "A Theatrical Agency."

Among the singing acts in vaudeville none is more famous than the DeLaur Trio, operatic vocalists. George Lyons and Eddie Parkes, "the harpist and the singer," will open the bill with their excellent act, and the Mooreoscope pictures will close as usual.

And hope once more asserted its sway, and under its influence their countenances and their manner resumed almost all their olden brightness.
