A PAIR OF MOOSE HORNS

As trophies of many seasons spent in the deep wildernesses of Maine and New Brunswick, Mr Winston has in his house an impressive number of mounted heads of deer moose caribou and other of the giants of the Among these is a pair of moose antlers of unusual spread one of which is marked by a hole through the broadest part There is no great branching horn of their taking is such that the owner regards them as a and trophy of a very poor

Some years ago before the open season was shot and in the Aroostook region at Long Lake with the snow days before Christmas

The two were the guide walking suddenly stopped and warning hand

Winston hated to lose and followed the others closely in his tracks

What is it he whispered

Then broke ahead of the ahead the Now the guide place just ahead

Yes I've got it now

We there's a moose right in between there He's headed now feeding but I see when I stepped on the Wait a minute there now you can see him

Winston looked There was no sight of the but at last a great appeared the tips of a with a spread of at least broad blade

What time of the year the moose cast ready to shed his horns The of Winston's bullet which he had aimed low had given just the jar necessary to shake off the antler There it lay while its owner was separating its mate as rapidly as possible

It's hunting instinct was the first to come his amusement Come He won't travel fast with that horn He's all lopsided

And the trail soon gave evidence that the startled animal was finding difficulty with his suddenly unbalanced head The left side was now some forty five pounds heavier than the right and a very ill balanced twenty five pounds too The moose swung constantly toward the left, stumbled every few steps, ran into trees and stumps and was evidently having a most unpleasant time of it

In a few minutes the men were near enough to hear it crashing along in laborious awkwardness

Then there came to their ears a sudden tunk!

Ran into another tree, I guess, panted Clint. "Come on!"

The next moment, however, there were indications of suddenly accelerated speed on the part of the game

Clint's jaw dropped. "I know what that means!" he muttered

"What?" gasped his employer.

Before Clint found breath to answer they came in sight of a tall beech with a fresh scar on its bark—and at its foot was the other horn!

A distant sound of breaking underbrush indicated the point where the moose, probably very grateful for the little assistance given to nature, was making a speedy and final exit from the scene.

"Well," said Clint, "even if you did make a thunderin' poor shot, you got a fine pair of horns, and Mr. Moose, he ain't regrettin' 'em any. I guess the arrangement ought to be gen'ally satisfactory."—BLISS COBURN.

MEN'S BONES ON FOOTPATH

Remains of Ancient Indians in Road Material Taken from an Old Mound.

Mill Valley, Cal.—Mill Valley has public roadways that are unlike any others in the world. Every time milady walks on the pretty, smooth white pathways and drives that lead to many of Mill Valley's fashionable homes she treads on the bones of men long dead, the aborigines of America for mingling with the shell and gravel that compose the paths are the remains of the Tamal Indians When ever she puts down a dainty French heel the sole of her shoe stamps into the earth a fragment of a skeleton of a redman

Now there are those who object to all this and therefore Mill Valley is split into factions One side has become acute using the bones of the Indians for paths driveways while another protests strenuously because they think it is a desecration of the dead

Near the entrance to Mill Valley a big mound raised by the aborigines is about the height of a fifteen story building and when the engineers were making the plat was thought best to dispose of it as fast as possible It was discovered that the mound was an old burial ground of the Tamal Indians after whom Mount Tamalpais was named Tamalpais meaning "high mountain"

Owing to the accessibility of the place a number of persons in Mill Valley have paved their garden paths with material from the mound and now highly carved with the shells the bones of the dead Indians And now the dust of the red American remains to be trodden by war dogs and hunters serve to fleet white the gorgeous flowers and green lawns of the Anglo Saxon conqueror

Efforts are being made to have the trustees erect a shaft over the remains of Mill Valley's first settlers and to stop the carriage the shells and bones from being ground The protesting ones say that in the respect should be shown the dead whether Indian or white even though they be merely bones the use of using them for footpaths does not appeal to them

Many of those who actually have their paths and still cast covetous eyes on the pretty have different ideas from the proposition from a practical standpoint bones are bones and that settles the matter By experience they have the shells that are and some hold makers of paths and walks for the paths as the waters percolate through and one may pass dry shod over the path

Several persons have been quietly excavating the mound and a number of relics have been unearthed Among them are stone metates used in grinding grains and nuts A skull in a mortar also has been dug out The skull is undoubtedly that of a woman as the Tamal Indians always buried females in this manner

Long arrow heads of bone and a dozen spear heads of obsidian have also been brought to light Further and deeper explorations will no doubt uncover skeletons relics and implements of both peace and war

Seattle, Wash. Bounty on four hundred rats, the catch of one day this week by the bounty squad, was paid by the city at the rat laboratory. Driven out of the brush bulkhead near the Moran Shipyard by excessive high tides, the animals sought shelter along the water front, and were trapped and poisoned by the men who make their livelihood from the bounty of 10 cents per head for all rats brought to the laboratory.

His Fond Ambition

All at once Mr Bigelow sighed—not gradually, or by degrees, or little by little Ah, no. But all at once he sighed, setting the plenitude of his countenance into a cast of woe that resembled a mask of tragedy and sighing as though he simply had to do it or else burst into tears And while this sound of sorrow is taking physical form and rippling mournfully over the prickliness of him and over the manifold chins of him until it shakes his mighty breast with every further tremors of woe let us look at Mr Bigelow and consider his case

He was born one of those noble men of nature who exemplify the might majesty and dominion of man and when he leaned across a door or leaned against a wall the tree fairies drew free and breathing easy apprehension and picked a penny for it And yet he was bloomed with the blossom of roses and his utterance feathered in the orient When he was astounded for his farthest his coat pockets turned feats of pedestrianism and when he moved over to pick up a pin or such he earth trembled and the feebler folks trembled as a lady with cheeks And yet his stature was one of weakness and the only fear was at sitting down he'd break through and fall to the ground Nay were he washed he would drown and in the perfection of symmetry And when he sighed on the [illegible] there was a breeze present forced the leaves together and loosed the hay The event thus was Mr Bigelow the gentleman was sighed
