NOT IN THE CATALOGUE

The reading room was as quiet as a tomb. Now and then some student turned a page impatiently and the pipe gave forth a sharp hiss as the steam escaped at a high pressure. Otherwise the visitors and attendants alike moved about with silent tread and spoke in the hushed language [illegible] were issued and the heavy old catalogue drawers [illegible] on [illegible] ways.

[illegible] quiet. After the [illegible] of a busy office who [illegible] to [illegible] treatment [illegible] greeted [illegible] the [illegible] was there that [illegible] was sorry when [illegible] after a brief [illegible] up the steps [illegible] the books were [illegible] take [illegible] of the busy [illegible]

[illegible] one [illegible] [illegible] became [illegible] [illegible] gone the little [illegible] [illegible] searching [illegible] dresses of [illegible] was the little old [illegible] everything [illegible] chemistry and [illegible] [illegible] men who dis- [illegible] day of taste [illegible] books on astronomy [illegible] and again he [illegible] interested in geography or [illegible]

Of [illegible] man Ballington was [illegible] at in his attendance [illegible] the most like an old [illegible] was he who had quietly [illegible] with suggestions which [illegible] to the room. He had been a regular and had known more of the routine than she did. But it was often that Linda was able to help him with a suggestion as to new books for her heart was in her work and she was something more than an automaton dealing out the books required with mechanical indifference.

Particularly Richard Ballington she knew the name from his slips seemed almost a part of the reading room. It was so regular as was he in attendance and his good morning smile was a pleasant opening of the day's routine. Last Christmas he had brought a little gift the day before the holiday and sometimes when luck was particularly good a box of candy would come back with a book.

The summer before their vacations had overlapped and for an entire month she had not seen him. She was glad when the vacation was over and she could come back to her place at the desk with the loved books around her and with Ballington sitting in the chair in a corner where he was least likely to be disturbed.

For once Linda was glad as the hands of the clock crept around to closing time and she knew that in an hour more she would be free to hurry home and creep into bed. Just before the hands reached the closing hour Ballington rose from his place and brought a book to the desk. Then instead of leaving he went over to the catalogue and began to scan the cards in one of the drawers. For a few months Linda watched him, then she looked up with the familiar glance of appeal and came over to the catalogue drawers.

Struck for a title, she asked in a voice so low that it seemed scarcely to be a whisper. "What's the matter?"

"I said Ballington. "Or to be exact"

"Logging" she asked. "That's under lumber."

"Not logging" he denied. "It's a shorter word. Love."

"I don't think that's catalogued" she said in dismay. "It's a funny subject. Suppose we look for Romance?"

"Let's look for romance, but not in books," he pleaded. "I know that this is a silly sort of proposal, but I love you little girl. I've been sure of it ever since last summer when I missed you for a whole month. Those two weeks when you were away I simply could not do any reading. I've been trying ever since to tell you, but I didn't see how. I don't want to hang around outside of the library until you come out and I do want you to help me look for romance, Linda, even though it is not in the titles?"

"I think it is in the catalogue," she said, softly "but if you'd rather, I'll help you after hours."

"There may be a romance in the catalogue" said Ballington, "but not as good a romance as there is this moment just outside the drawers. You do care a little bit, Linda."

"Since last vacation," she admitted. "You may come this evening if you like to begin the study."

Ballington made a note of her address and left the place with elastic step and beating heart, while Linda went back to recive the books the readers were returning. As she gave a final look around as the last book was stacked and the day's work done, she patted the catalogue cabinet as she passed it.

"You're awfully wise," she whispered, "with your thousands of titles, but you haven't a 'Love,' and I'm sorry for you." Then Linda walked out to enter a new world.
