Romance and John Smith

The Romanticist sighed deeply and pushed back from a very white forehead, two tiny tendrils of golden hair.

"It's no use, Polly," she said disconsolately. "I shall never meet a man who is my ideal—and I shall never marry one who is not."

Polly Nelson laughed a melodious infectious laugh. "For my part," she said, "I prefer something more substantial than moonlight serenades."

Patricia sniffed. "You haven't one article of romance in you," she said. "The man I marry must be tall and handsome, and he must write poetry to me."

"And father will foot the bills," Polly interrupted maliciously.

Patricia arose with dignity. "Polly," she said, sternly. "It isn't your suit that you can't understand me (you can't appreciate anything beautiful)."

"Jealous!" Polly cried after her. "but you wait—I'll get even with you." Polly looked up from her perusal of the morning's mail with a smile.

"And who is the friend?" inquired Patricia, not without interest.

Patricia made a charming moue. "That is enough," she said, "my interest has completely vanished."

Polly ignored her remark and picked up the letter. "Smith used to go on college with me," she read aloud, and her face lit up.

"Indeed," interrupted Patricia, with no sarcasm. "my dear cousin Harry set fine language. You may tell my cousin for me that 'Pat' will be his unusual friend quite alone."

"There's no danger of your forgetting my name, Miss Loving," he said after the introduction. "Just in ordinary John Smith."

"I don't know of you," said Polly airily. "I told him that you didn't wish to have anything to do with him."

"Why, certainly I did," said Polly innocently. "you did say that, didn't you?" And she rushed from the room.

Harry and Polly occupied the front seat, and Mr. Smith and Patricia the rear seat in the tonneau, on the way over to the club dance.

A young Baltimore couple, recently united in matrimony, were going over their wedding presents just after their return from the honeymoon.

The Negro in Africa forms perhaps one-fifth of the population that inhabit the continent, and they dwell in the southern Sudan, with their largest population on the West Coast from Cape Verde south and eastward along the Gulf of Guinea to the equator.

OLD FASHIONED SUMMER BUTTERMILK

Baked Buttermilk for the Complexion —How it Was Prepared.

Buttermilk in days long gone by was almost a social in the hands of the beauties of the time.

Ingredients for the face as well as the portions in which they indulged were probably responsible for the lovely complexion which made pale cheeks possess odes to the bloom of their cheeks.

"Mr. Smith," said Patricia, brokenly, "I want to apologize to you."

The man turned and regarded her steadily. "There is no need for it, Miss Loving," he said slowly.

"The girl bent her head. "I am quite sure," she said.

They had reached a deserted part of the garden and the man turned and caught her almost roughly by the shoulders.

Patricia gasped. "But—" "Never mind that, dear," he said, "will you marry me?"

Patricia smiled. "Yes," she said, "I will."

It was not until they were returning home that night that Jack Smith leaned forward and told Polly.

"You've got to admit, though, that the name of John Smith is a lot more common than that of Malster," laughed Polly.

"John Smith is the finest name in the world," said Patricia, stoutly, as she leaned back comfortably in the tonneau.

THEY HUNT BY TELEPHONE. Wires Used to Summon Sportsmen When Game is Sighted.

The rural telephone plays an important part in bird shooting in the prairie provinces of Canada.

Let a flock of geese be sighted on its way south from the breeding grounds on the shores of Hudson Bay or up the Yukon, or on its return north in the spring, and the telephone is brought into play to summon sportsmen for twenty miles around.

They dig holes deep enough to conceal man and set decoys about thirty yards away. Experienced hunters will wait until the flock is passing and then shoot into the flock from behind.

Hub of German Empire. Unter den Linden is the centre spot of Berlin and the hub of the German Empire.

A DEALER IN DISILLUSION

It seemed to Madeline Lane that she had long ago...

"Lorraine and Violet will enjoy it just as much," she thought. "I must run for directly after dinner and tell them that they are to go with me."

"I don't understand, Mr. Clayton," she said, a little astonished. "The play is all right; I took care of that; I wouldn't ask the girls until I'm really sure."

"Why, you've known me all my life!" cried Madeline Lane. "You've let me take them before, and I've seen the same how we always was. It's too absurd!"

"It may seem absurd even when I try to tell you," answered Mrs. Clayton. "I'm just being myself, but I'm not a hypocrite. Perhaps I can't explain it either."

"But what?" interrupted Madeline Lane, a little impatiently. "What are you going to accuse me of?"

"I don't understand you," Madeline Lane said, now positively bewildered.

"Think a moment and you will see how I can't be. To wash you Violet and Madeline have learned to treat slightly the big change."

"I don't understand you," Madeline Lane said, now positively bewildered.

"You are unjust to me, Mrs. Clayton," she said, and her eyes were full of tears.

But all the way home her clever head and her honest heart strove together. She remembered when she had first read her "Framish Century Maxims" to the girls that Violet had cried out:

"Oh, how splendid! I just love to read them! But—A little wistfully—'doesn't it make you unhappy to believe those things?'"

Reductors in Steel-Making. The increasing employment of reducing agents of many kinds in the manufacture of steel is primarily due to the necessity of getting rid of blow-holes and gas bubbles.

Chilled the "Copper". An empty cork lies on a track on the Atlantic coast platform one day this week. Out of schedule one of the employees in the baggage-car crawled into the cork box and drew it down.
