Marina Spider. In a French scientific periodical M. ouls Fage describes a new species of marine spider. It has been found among calcareous sea weeds on the Mediterranean shore. Like our own water spider, it can carry under water with it a bubble of air. It lives in the burrows of rock boring shells, for in the empty shells of other species. By spinning numerous threads across the mouth, it keeps the water out of its submarine abode It can creep about the bottom, but thas to keep a firm hold to prevent the shell from rising to the surface. Small flies and mites probably serve it for food.
