In Angela's Garden

A Fourth of July Incident

By RUBY WOODS

THE facts that Angela's flower garden occupied less than 200 square feet of space and consisted of nothing more than some wooden boxes fastened to the fire escape at the library window made her none the less enthusiastic about it.

Every morning at 7 she was on the fire escape in her pale blue bonnet attending to her pots, paying special attention to the watering of the pansies.

On the morning of the Fourth of July Angela opened the window a little earlier than usual. The noises around had awakened her. As she was executing the last movement of her now gracefully acquired exit from the window a firecracker fell from above and shot off in her garden. Angela started and covered her face.

"ARE YOU HURRY?" HE ASKED FRANKLIN.

A young man descended quickly by means of the iron ladder.

"Are you hurt?" he asked fearfully.

Angela uncovered her face and looked up. "No, I think not. I was frightened," she said, looking at the remains of the offending firecracker.

He heaved a sigh of relief.

"It was awfully careless of me," he went on, standing on the bottom rung of the ladder. Angela's garden was hardly large enough for two. "I was just playing 'little boy' again and trying to imagine myself in the country instead of a city apartment. I hope you'll pardon me." There was so much self reproach in his tone that Angela felt that he was truly sorry.

"Of course I'll pardon you," she said, with the merest suggestion of a laugh.

"I won't shoot any more crackers today. A miss is as good as a mile and it might be a life or death time," he said, fingering the leaf of a nasturtium which had found its way up along the railing.

"But, indeed, I won't be out here long," began Angela, wondering why she was not angry because he remained on the ladder. "I"—

"You may remain here all day," he interrupted. "I have done enough mischief for one Fourth."

The girl stopped over and began to twist a wild vine into plaits. The young man could not help hoping that he might some day influence the rare human flower before him along the path he wished it to travel as easily and gently as she twisted the nasturtium about the iron bar.

He turned and began to climb the ladder.

"I am sorry I stepped out so inopportunistly and marred your Independence day," said Angela, looking up at him. "Please don't stop your fireworks for me."

"Marred my Independence day," he said to himself as he closed the window upstairs. "Well, I don't know about that, but she's marred my peace of mind. Jove, she is pretty!"

So the young man in the apartment above Angela's garden found it necessary to rise earlier than was his habit after that Fourth of July morning for a little fresh air.

And Angela? It may be that her flowers received less attention after the Fourth of July. But perhaps the exploding of that firecracker hindered their progress; smoke stunts the growth they say.

It was raining one morning when Angela opened the window. Close to the ladder stood a pot of flowers which Angela had not planted, one which she had never seen. It was tall and green, and all over it hung little red hearts. She was glad it was raining and that she could not go out among her flowers, because she wanted time to think—time in which to be angry. But some

GOOD INDEPENDENCE DAY READING.

HAVE you ever noticed that the Fourth of July is a national holiday? It is a national holiday because it is the day when we celebrate our independence from Great Britain.

It is the day when we remember the brave men who fought for our freedom and the day when we thank the men who have kept our country free.

It is the day when we think of the men who have given us the right to live and let live and the day when we think of the men who have given us the right to be free.

It is the day when we think of the men who have given us the right to be happy and the day when we think of the men who have given us the right to be proud.

It is the day when we think of the men who have given us the right to be brave and the day when we think of the men who have given us the right to be true.

It is the day when we think of the men who have given us the right to be good and the day when we think of the men who have given us the right to be great.

It is the day when we think of the men who have given us the right to be wise and the day when we think of the men who have given us the right to be just.

It is the day when we think of the men who have given us the right to be kind and the day when we think of the men who have given us the right to be noble.

how she found it would take more time than she could spare.

The next morning Angela said to the young man on the ladder:

"You'll observe that my garden has been materially increased since the day before yesterday?" And after a minute, in which neither spoke, she said, "They are very, very pretty."

Angela continued to wash the faces of the pansies, though they did not need it after the rain of the day before. And the little velvety leaves felt the nervous twitches in the fingers which dressed them.

"I did not know it would rain on them when I put them there," said the young man, glancing at the hearts.

"But it isn't raining now," she said, still looking at the pansies.

"Angela, will you let the sun shine on my heart always as brightly as it is now shining on the flowers' hearts?" Look up, Angela. I love you," he said.

"If you won't shoot any more firecrackers at me," she replied, with a happy, tremulous little laugh. "If you who have taken away my Independence days now."

Your Flag and Mine

Your flag and mine. How proudly there it flutters in the morning breeze. And who, beholding it, shall dare To turn in doubt or let asleep? Attend his noblest enterprises! Your flag and mine and ours to guard So that in future centuries Still proudly striped and bravely starred, Unshaken by shadow, by wind, by storm, Its might shall thrill its beauty proud.

Your flag and mine. And shall we let Its glory die or splendor fade? Who doubts that freedom stands if not Our deed be heroically done? By selfishness or passion swayed?

"YOUR FLAG AND MINE AND OURS TO GUARD."

Your flag and mine and ours to hold. In tender reverence, unafraid, Our faith adorning every fold, Its virtue strong, its honor bold, Its grace to all the world displayed.

Your flag and mine. How splendidly It flutters out against the sky! How glorious it is to see! How fair to you, how dear to me! Most proud of all the flags that fly! Your flag and mine and ours to keep Unsifted, unshamed and waving high— Our trust unflinching, our courage deep— For those whom, after we shall sleep, It shall inspire and glorify.

—S. E. Kiser in Chicago Herald.

Patriots Stand Before Kings.

Franklin, Jay, Gallatin, Howard and scores of American statesmen have stood before kings, have been of the throngs that crowded court receptions, and they have always borne themselves gallantly and been recognized everywhere as nature's noblemen. The American people are unworthy of these creators of their country if they ever neglect to cherish the memory of the greatness of their patriots.
