The Great Bank Mystery

A Story of an Employee's Vindication By P. A. MITCHELL

There was a tele-champetre in progress on the grounds of M. Paul Brisson, a wealthy manufacturer, in the Bois de Boulogne. It was given to the father of his daughter, Madame de Lamoignon, a young widow without fortune, who was connected with the nobility of France.

Both Laroque and the person in charge of the currency were instructed to keep the matter a secret, and the governor took it into his own hands.

She did not respond to his advances, and wrote that an official in the bank some years before had been discharged under suspicion of dishonesty. The discharged man had suffered much by this injustice, the consequences of which included loss of salary amounting to a certain amount.
