The Great Bank Mystery

A Story of an Employee's Vindication

By P. A. MITCHELL

There was a tele-champetre in progress on the grounds of M. Paul Brisson, a wealthy manufacturer, in the Bois de Boulogne. It was given to the father of his daughter, M. de Lamoignon, a young man who, without fortune, was dependent on the nobility of France.

There were dancing and feasting in the Bois de Boulogne, where M. de Lamoignon was with his father. The father was at the time of his life a member of a fair salary in the possession of an estate from which he drew a comfortable income.

Both Laroque and the person in charge of the currency were instructed to keep the matter a secret, and the governor took it into his own hands. However he could do nothing but address a communication to the writer of the note, to be called for at the general delivery window.

She did not respond to a personal note written by an official in the bank some years before had been discharged under suspicion of dishonesty. The discharged man had suffered much by this injustice, the consequences of which included loss of salary amounting to a certain amount.

After mature deliberation the governor concluded that it would be impossible among so many to hit on the person named. He believed that there was a bank somewhere among his subordinates, that one of them was a confederate of the person who was endeavoring to get money from the bank.

When Vice Admiral Henry T. Mayo was appointed to succeed Admiral Frank P. Fletcher as commander of the Atlantic fleet he was advanced to the rank of admiral. Admiral Fletcher's rank was held longer than that of any other admiral in the navy.

Colonel John Biddle, who has just been appointed superintendent of the Military Academy at West Point, is considered one of the ablest officers of the engineer corps. He will succeed Colonel C. P. Townsend on July 1.
