

A Garden Of Roses

And the Old, Old Story That Was Told There.

By MARTHA COBB, SANFORD

The "tea garden" had flourished from the moment the idea of it had entered Natalie's pretty blond head. No tourist visiting this sunny southern spot would have thought of leaving it without sipping his favorite brand at least once out of the old-fashioned Sheldon china.

There were many who continued to come day after day who were really not tea drinkers at all, only wicked pretenders. It is to be suspected that they found their refreshment in watching Natalie's graceful little figure as she sat behind the tall antique silver settee under the rose covered pergola leading into the garden.

Among these pretenders, as one in Bellan could have told you, were Dwight Ellsworth and the major. Dwight would never force (and for that matter neither would Natalie) the day he and his father had brought their big dusty machine to a halt under the quaint little sign of the "tea garden."

Natalie herself, all fresh, crushable pinkness from the tip of her aristocratic little ears to the trim of her gown, had answered the tinkling bell. Could they be served to tea perhaps? The men managed to stammer at simultaneously. Most certainly they could, and with they follow Natalie.

Delightfully indeed they would. Indeed, the younger man registered in his heart the vow to follow her always, anywhere, although it was his first sight of her.

So out under the rose bowers into the garden they trailed their dark motor coats in the wake of Natalie's red riding habit, and while waiting for the tea to be brewed they revolved in the pretensions of the spot.

Against the gray walls of the quaint little stone house leaned the high stalks of Easter lilies, some already bursting into bloom. Flanking the trim little garden walks were roses in profusion, pink and yellow and red and white. Away off in one corner was a wide patch of dark green violet leaves.

"Think of violet outside of hothouse," exclaimed the younger man. "I suppose the problem of picking them wouldn't come within the limit of any ordinary mortal's finances."

Natalie, approaching just then with a trim, colored maid behind her, overheard and laughed delightfully.

"They are free for the picking," she answered with charming hospitality to the guests.

Dwight's gallantry rose instantly to meet her graciousness.

"Could you not procure further," he asked, will point him out, and beg the lad of the garden to gather them for the guests herself?"

Natalie, blushing, for she was very young, tripped down the garden walk in a twinkling.

As she knelt in the cool, rich depth of green, her slender white hands deftly gathering the long stemmed violets, the sunlight resting on the gold of her hair, Dwight Ellsworth watched and utterly forgot to drink his tea, even in make believe.

that the mother and father of these two impressionable young people thereupon pieced together out of their fragmentary knowledge Natalie and Dwight listened with all their sympathetic young souls.

It was the old story of a southern girl falling in love with a young northern officer and of her father's relentless opposition to the match, even to forbidding the girl from ever writing to her lover or of letting him know her whereabouts after the war.

The girl had died of a broken heart. The man married, to be sure, but to his son he bequeathed with loving remembrance the little silver spoon marked "N. S."

On the strength of this mutual bond of sentiment it was natural that the two young people should frequent the little tea garden.

Not always at the popular social hour, to be sure. In fact, to Natalie's delight, they pointedly avoided that gratuitous part of the day sometimes deferring their visit till the sun had gone down, and on rare occasions still, returning even had staid its way into the fragrant garden.

"I've brought you something to-night, Natalie," announced the major on one such occasion, unfolding from its crumpled tissue wrappings a tiny silver spoon. "You see," he added, "it really belongs to you, my dear young girl, and I thought that just now would be an appropriate time to give it over into your keeping—a sort of engagement present, you know."

"An engagement present?" gasped Natalie. "But I'm not engaged."

"Oh, well," laughed the major teasingly. "I may be a bit of a stammerer, but I really belong to you, my dear young girl, and I thought that just now would be an appropriate time to give it over into your keeping—a sort of engagement present, you know."

"I mean—when was it?" he corrected himself.

"Before the war," answered Natalie solemnly.

"And the girl's name was Natalie," he added softly, falling into the tread of her thought. "And her lover's name was Dwight, and I think I know what he said to her."

No word from Natalie, but they had come to the rose arbor again and all unconscious she stopped and leaned against it, waiting for the words that should set her heart thumping.

"And he said," went on Dwight, taking possession of both her slender white hands, "you are the flower of my heart, beloved. Lift up your sweet face, for I love you."

And Natalie raised her pretty head, and the lover lowered his till their lips met.

The roses seemed suddenly to be waving of perfume and all the little leaves to tremble with delight.

PLACING THE HOUSE.

A Plea to Have It Face the Garden and Not the Roadway.

In America a small house is usually set far back from the public road, and the space between the road and the house is given over to a lawn or garden open to the passer by. On a larger lot the house will be set half way, the same open lawn in front and a vegetable garden in the rear.

Surely we are all agreed that the charm of home life lies in its privacy. No one wants strangers looking into his house. Why should he deliberately bare his gardens, lawns, to the public gaze? It is not an egotistical selfishness, this inclining one's own

It is rather the common sense practice of people who live simple lives. We have too long lived in a careless indifference to the things that passed for decency. We have sacrificed our peace of mind, throwing them all before the wind, for the sake of a few dollars' worth of green.

This is a very commendable in a closely situated suburban town, but even there there is a possibility of developing the side and back yards into an open garden. Hedges, and lattice work, used with discretion. The landscape gardener, with a little careful planning, will take on dignity and grace.

In European towns it is a common practice to plant the house so that it turns its back on the street and faces its own garden. This arrangement has all the advantages that any one can offer—privacy and repose and an attractive garden space.

If your lot of land is very small and you wish your main rooms to face the street you can arrange to have adequate planting between street and house, and in this way screen the family rooms. Rooms so placed will receive the maximum of noise and dust, however. Of course if your interest is such that you have to have a constant view of happenings on the street you are not interested in this argument for quiet and privacy.—"The House," by Ruby Ross Goodnow and Rayne Adams.
