Postal Service Development.

As late as the fifteenth century butchers or drovers who went about buying cattle were the principal carriers of private correspondence. In the twelfth century the University of Paris established a body of pedestrian messengers, who bore letters from its thousands of students to the various countries of Europe from which they came and brought to them the money they needed for the prosecution of their studies. The great development of commerce following the crusades and the geographical discoveries of the Italians, Portuguese and Spaniards created a necessity for business correspondence about the beginning of the sixteenth century.

Sprat.

As long ago as Elizabeth's time "sprat" was used as a term of contempt and as an article of diet it has always been deemed but humble fare, with which, however, good economists are very well content today, remarks the London Chronicle. But though despised in its adult state, it is in its infancy that highly esteemed delicacy, whitebait. We were a long time, however, in recognizing the fact, for naturalists disputed among themselves whether the honor should be accorded to the fry of shad, pilchards, or herring and only lately did they decide that it belonged to the herring and sprat.

Hieroglyphics Deciphered.

The hieroglyphic writings on Easter Island, perhaps its salient and most remarkable feature, have been executed on tablets of wood. There appear to have been two kinds of script, as in other cases of ancient writings; a sacred and a common. Quite recently a native was discovered who could decipher the latter. In the Caroline Islands, Chatham Islands, and even among the Battas and Inner Sumatras, a rude approach to such writings, and consequent proof of former civilization, have been found.
