BARRED THE OVERHEAD SIGN

Authorities of City of Londons Pre hibited the Projecting Nuleance in Eighteenth Century.

Many things to which we are now so thoroughly accustomed that they seem natural and obvious took the world a long time to think of, observes Everyday Science. Numbering the houses or shops in a street as a means of identifying them seems a very simple device, but nobody thought of it until well on in the Eighteenth century.

Until then they got on as well as they could with no numbers, and in London streets, like Cheapside, every shopkeeper tried to outdo his rivals in the size and grandeur of his signboard. They projected over the street, and every now and then fell down and Rochester, N. Y. killed somebody. They creaked and groaned terribly whenever the wind blew, and it shows what a nulsance they were that within a year of house numbering being introduced signboards which projected from the walls were prohibited.

> The first London street to be numtered in March, 1764, was New Burlington street, and the next Lincoln's
