no matter what the fabric used. The new silhouette is a modernized version of the costumes worn by the pages of Henry II. This new line is achieved by the addition of a flare at a low hipline. These flares are achieved through godets or plaits and are matched by similar treatments on the skirt. The jumper takes to this new silhouette with great ease; in fact last year's straight models could in this manner become "le dernier cri"!

The smoking jacket is perhaps at its best in a finely plaited skirt of crepe with vest of plain gold lame and coat of brocade in soft colors. That is its version for evening wear; for the street it may be a navy rep jacket and plaid skirt or any of the

The Tailored Suit. Time was when the strictly tailored two-piece suit was the foundation of every well dressed woman's wardrobe. Again this spring the tailored suit has achieved something of its old supremacy. Smart, brisk, it carries with it something of the very spirit of spring. But women who know how to dress realize that in its most tailored note it is not for all women. They say not only must its wearer be adapted, physically, to its straight, slim lines, but she must be adapted psychologically as well. Certainly it may be the smartest of modes on the right woman, and on the wrong one something else again.

But so firmly embedded in the feminine heart is the love for the twopiece suit that Fashion has not con- which is so named because it is a tented herself with designing merely favorite shade of the duchess of York. the mannish type.
