American Cities Pay Laborers Shameful Wages

Federal Bureau of Labor Makes Public Results of a Survey Just Made by the Bureau

Washington, D. C., July 11.—Light on what the American public thinks of the right to the lowest wage is revealed in an account just made public of wages paid street laborers by American cities and towns of over twenty-five hundred population.

Of these all but 20 are in the southern tier of states from Virginia to Texas, including Kentucky and Tennessee.

Another 200 pay between 30 cents and under 35, making all together nearly 600 paying under 30 cents.

Another 300 pay between 35 cents and under 40. This group includes larger places in the South and a scattering of small towns throughout the rest of the country.

Another 300 pay between 40 cents and under 45 cents an hour. About 15% pay the 50 cent mark.

These wages are both a cause and an effect of general low wage rates for ordinary labor in the United States.

Benedictines Revise Two Additional Books Of the Vulgate Bible

Twenty-Two Years of Unceasing Labor Is Given To Completed Work—Greatest Possible Care Is Exercised

Vatican City, July 11.—Presentation to His Holiness the second volume of the Vulgate Bible marks the culmination of twenty-two years of unceasing labor on the part of the Benedictine Fathers, to whom that arduous task was assigned by Pope Pius X. in 1907.

Revision Was Necessary The need for revision of the Bible was readily seen when it was considered that although we have been reading the Bible for almost two thousand years we have not an authentic text.

Since the day of St. Jerome there have been many corruptions of the Sacred Scriptures, and from the new codices that remain many copies have been made, these being copies of the original.

The actual work of revising the Bible, interesting to the onlooker, but in itself extremely tedious, is carried out in the following manner:

How The Work Is Done

The actual work of revising the Bible, interesting to the onlooker, but in itself extremely tedious, is carried out in the following manner:

One text is taken as the criterion by which all the other texts are judged, and any deviations from it noticed in other manuscripts are accordingly marked down and compared.

For instance, starting with Genesis in the Clementine text, the first sentence is written down, without any capital letters, commas, or full stops, and a slip of paper, every word of that sentence is then tested by comparison with the other various readings, a note is affixed below the word on the slip, recording the divergence and the manuscript in which it is found.

Thus, by a constant sifting of the text, the true version is at length prepared.

This process, tedious and fatiguing as it is, is carried out with every single word, and as each sentence and chapter is finished the work is passed on to someone else to revise.

Not until it has been minutely examined three times by three different persons is it considered perfect; and often a batch of manuscripts will have traveled far and wide before completion, in the endeavor to subject them to thorough criticism.

The whole Bible will not, needless to say, be complete during our lifetime.
