Dame Fashion Smiles
By Grace Jewett Austin

Indians are said to talk about special things as being "good medicine." Dame Fashion is inclined to think that if anything is "good medicine," it is bright color. Lately she had the opportunity of attending a dance recital by children and quite young girls, and later, an evening of interpretative dancing by artists, and Grace J. Austin, third, a dramatic swimming exhibit at an indoor pool, where "King Neptune" in costume presided at the "Rivalry of the Ne-reids," and swimmers attired as fishes and frogs kept the pool alive with glancing silver and green. Had color been abstracted, the value of all of these would have been lessened by at least three-fourths. Also not long ago Dame Fashion attended a session of the Daughters of the American Revolution where a group of sweet old ladies, all over eighty, and one of them ninety-four, formed a center of attraction. All but one wore in black garb, and the fifth one wore shades of violet, deeper and lighter combined.

Perhaps out of the list of readers, the number is comparatively small who must buy or make a "formal" gown, and yet in these days of happy youth, it does seem as though all of us might find some light-hearted young relative in whom to be interested, even though a "formal" is not quite the gown we might think of choosing for ourselves. You can easily see the connection in Dame Fashion's thought, for if ever there is a place where wonderful color wears and combines and radiates, it is at a great function, like the many university Senior balls all over the country, back in June, where perhaps a thousand "formals" glittered.

These formal gowns could never have been prettier than they are this year, for the reason that it is a "tulle and taffeta" season—especially lovely materials. Dame Fashion took especial note of one that might please the most fastidious. Its bodice was of wild-rose tulle, and over its dipping-in-the-back taffeta skirt rippled the little ruffles of tulle, with this artistic touch, that each ruffle was double, with a ruffle of palest orchid placed over each ruffle of pale rose, so that in effect, as the skirt swayed back and forth it seemed to have fascinating shadows instead of simply one general rose tone. At the waistline was placed at the left a spray of roses with a canopy leaf or two of rich black velvet, which acted with as much effect as a punctuation mark in a sentence.

Gowns of this type, with living roses to give the punctuation instead of artificial ones, are often worn as mink of honor and bridesmaid gowns at formal summer weddings. Then the droop of a wide-brimmed hat matching the gown comes to add to the picture. And that reminds Dame Fashion that at an elaborate tea of late she thought if it were possible she would see which were most abundant—the wide-brimmed or the close hats. The wide-brimmed ones had gained greatly in number—with every fur coat now in storage, for fur coats simply glow at wide brims, but it was still about a half and half.

And speaking of weddings, Dame Fashion held in her hand recently with an much interest one of these newest of new wedding rings, which will fold perfectly flat and are made of little platinum links combined with tiniest of bars, set with little diamonds. Even wedding rings, it seems, are too easily portable.
