Noted Writer Gives Generous Praise To South American People

and rational barriers are interposed against the suspect and the unfit. The newcomer, who is industrious and strong bodied, who is willing to work the land, has governmental aid from the hour of his landing until he becomes self-sustaining. By a wisely administered screening process the dross are closed on the other kind."

Fine Religious Tolerance

Touching on the religious question, Mr. Cobb writes as follows: "The returned emigrant, if fairly minded, will tell you that in practically all the important countries of South America, and in one or two which are not rated as being important but all of them countries, mind you, where an overwhelming majority of the population are professed Catholics—there is prevalent a tolerance in religious issues which is a refreshing contrast to the sectarian prevalent in some sections of our country.

"To begin with, the well-bred South American is not drawn into a controversy with you merely because you happen to differ with him on any item of dogmatic faith, be it social, or moral, political or spiritual. He leaves you to your opinion, no matter how erroneous he privately may think that opinion is. In short, he doesn't set himself up to be his brother's keeper—and that I think, is a beautiful virtue common in this land and, by contrast, exceedingly rare in a certain land which I might mention, but won't."

There is a Fine Something

"In the second place, there is a fine something about the South American temperament which saves its owner from manifesting prejudices against another man's conscientious convictions. Without surrendering his own beliefs, he nevertheless has an inspiring mind for any good which may hide in the stranger's church. More than anything else, this, I think, helps to explain the agreeable phenomena which are met with here and there, and, as you might almost say, everywhere down there. In South America, it would appear that one may be non-Protestant without being anti-Protestant, and vice-versa, which is pleasant for all concerned."

Another Writer Agrees

The Chicago Tribune recently carried a special copyrighted article on Chile, by Don Fernando, in which emphasis is given to the same spirit described by Mr. Cobb. In this article a prominent non-Catholic business man in Chile is quoted as saying: "There is no problem of church and state in Chile. While it is true there will be a much better understanding existing between the people of Mexico and the people of the United States. This better understanding, I am confident, will insure a continuance of the present amicable relations and will prove beneficial to the peoples of both countries.

Archbishop Orozco was accompanied to Washington by the Rt. Rev. Msgr. Jose Gutierrez, Canon of the Cathedral of Guadalajara. Msgr. Gutierrez came to the United States to consider the subraja of religious hostility in Mexico, being sent to this country on a mission by the Mexican hierarchy. Unable to return, he went to Los Angeles, where he was placed in charge of a parish at Belvedere by the Rt. Rev. John J. Cantwell, Bishop of Los Angeles. He served this parish, a center of Mexican population in California, until the arrival of Archbishop Orozco in Laredo, when he joined His Grace. Since, he has been acting as secretary to the Prelate.

Looks Well Despite Hardships

Archbishop Orozco appears to be in good health, despite the three years he spent as a fugitive in the mountains of the State of Jalisco, dodging the federal troops and with a price upon his head.

Soon after the public declarations of President Portes Gil and Archbishop Ruiz y Flores, which resulted in the return of the clergy and the reopening of the churches, Archbishop Orozco visited Mexico City and convinced Government officials of the truth of his assertions that he never had had any part in the armed opposition to the Government.
