The Pursuit of Happiness

Chapter Five

One celebrated character who has been mentioned only in passing in the early chapters of this narrative was Johnny Reilly. Johnny was known among his comrades as "actor". In the 14 years of his life Johnny had appeared before a theater audience only once; but his notorious failure to make good on that occasion was sufficient reason to merit for him the title of "the actor among the pupils of St. Joseph's school."

It came about in this way: The village theater, which occupies a site directly opposite St. Joseph's school had been experiencing a lean season, due, in part, to the poor quality of entertainment provided, and in part, to the tendency of the villagers to patronize the theaters in the larger centers of population. To get the public better acquainted with the local play house the new manager had his plan of having an "amateur night" when village youths would be invited to appear on the stage and display their talents before their friends.

Johnny becomes a soloist. Johnny Reilly, up to this time had been just two shows: "Uncle Tom's Cabin" and "The Connecticut Yankee." Deep down in his heart he cherished a desire to become an actor. "Amateur night" afforded him the opportunity to begin his theatrical career. If Johnny had been a girl with long yellow hair, he would have endeavored, without a doubt, to portray the character of "Little Eva," and bring tears to the eyes of emotional patrons. But since he was only a boy he figured that singing was the safest bet for a beginner. So Johnny became a soloist. Here we have Johnny's own account of his efforts, as he gave it to his teacher, the manager of "amateur night."

"Sister, I was an actor last night. I went on the stage at the Blue Moon."

"Did you dance, Johnny?"

"No, Sister. They had me down on the program as a soloist. I sang 'Silver Threads Among the Gold'."

"Do you mean to say you had the courage to get up before an audience that knows you and sings 'Darling I am growing old'?"

"Please, Sister, that's all the farther I got."

"What happened then?"

"I see by your whiskers."

"Well, Harold Murphy was here, and Bill Maloney and a lot of other fellows, and when I sang 'Darling I am growing old,' Murphy shouted 'Why, you are not, see there!' and Maloney yelled: 'So I see by your whiskers.' Away back in the audience was that noisy Helen Hickey, with her whole gang of girls, and they all began to sing my song. Emily Rauber came all the way down to the stage and tried to hand me a head of cabbage for a bouquet of flowers. Oh, it was awful, Sister."

"Why didn't you sing on your own song, paying no attention to them?"

Things You Will Never Be Sorry For

For having a pure life.
For doing your best.
For being kind to the poor.
For thinking before speaking.
For harboring clean thoughts.
For standing by your principles.
For stopping your ears to the words of God.
For being square in your dealings.
For keeping your promises.

sugar in the coffee before he poured it in the cups; and John did not forget. Out of his basket he fished a paper bag, dumped half its contents into the coffee-pot and began stirring vigorously. Like a good housekeeper he saved some for a second brewing. Chet Hoffman took a great draught of the delicious beverage and made an awful face. Dick Driscoll tasted his. "Euh-eh," Betty McLane sipped a little and began to scream that she was poisoned. The cook tasted his coffee and solemnly declared that he had used salt instead of sugar. No one disputed him. While the pupils turned their attention to the lemonade jug, the cook was advised by Sister to empty the coffee pot into the creek. In doing this, Johnny slipped and fell in the creek. What excitement ensued as the coffee-maker struggled in the water.

"Come back to Erin, Mavourneen," shouted Maloney.
"Let me hang you out to dry," said Dick.
"Why your own mother wouldn't know you," cried Helen Hickey, the tease.

Shaking Himself Like a Dog
By this time Johnny had regained the bank and sent his tormentors scattering in every direction when he began shaking himself like a wet dog. At supper time a self-appointed committee of girls watched the mixing of sugar and coffee. The picnic day passed all too quickly, especially for Rowan who spent most of the time in the sun drying himself. As all gathered up their belongings and stood out at the road awaiting the bus, Johnny Reilly and Bill Maloney, inseparable companions, decided to walk home through the fields.

They walked along enjoying, at most in silence, the calm of the living light. It was near that time of day when there are only half lights. Suddenly they saw before

The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Victor Hurley of East Henrietta, pastor of the Church of the Good Shepherd, on Oct. 15. Following a wedding breakfast at the Seneca Hotel, the couple left on a motor trip to Toronto, Montreal and Quebec. The bridesmaid was Miss Evelyn Southern, of Roswood Terrace. Richard Fagan, twin brother of the groom, sergeant of railroad detectives of the Buffalo, Rochester & Pittsburgh Railway, was best man. Miss Baker attended Charlotte them an object moving slowly down the green lane.

"What is it?" asked John.
"I can't make it out. Let us hurry and overtake it."

Face to Face with Poverty
Quickening their pace they soon found that the object of their curiosity was a little girl about nine years old, carrying a bundle of wood that was far too heavy for her slender strength. She was pale and looked sickly, and was poorly clad.

"Let me help you," said Johnny as he lifted the load from the child.
"Oh, I'm so tired," gasped the little creature with a sigh.
"I should think you would be. Where do you live?" asked Maloney.
"Up that shanty up there," pointing to a dilapidated and apparently abandoned house about 500 yards ahead.

On reaching the hovel, the two bright, happy boys, for the first time in their joyous lives, stood face to face with abject poverty. Mabel, the little girl and her mother lived alone. There was not a thing to eat in the house and no hope of getting anything. The boys were shocked—thrilled. Could such misery exist so near them, and they had been feasting all day?

To the Rescue with Food
It was dark when the boys reached home, and they were very tired; but both insisted that if their mothers would fill baskets they would go back at once to the starving woman and girl. Bill's father drove the lads as near as he could to the scene of their charity. Even then they had to walk a mile across the fields. But they were happy—immensely happy when they saw what gladness their charity brought into the lives of others. Through the efforts of these two merry boys, the poor widow and her child were soon quartered in a comfortable little house in the village. Mabel grew fat and was nearly dressed, and the mother and child were soon quartered in a comfortable little house in the village. Mabel grew fat and was nearly dressed, and the mother and child were soon quartered in a comfortable little house in the village. Mabel grew fat and was nearly dressed, and the mother and child were soon quartered in a comfortable little house in the village.
