Ex-Senator Wadsworth Opposes U. S. Control of Nation's Schools; Many New Contestants Wanted in $10,000 Subscription Campaign

No Federal Control Of Schools Wanted Says J. W. Wadsworth

Plan To Make Central Board Authority On Methods Of Learning in America Absurdly Impossible, Says Former Senator—Sees Darwinian Teachers Banished and Pope Put Before Students As Menace

SAYS PEOPLE OF STATES ARE COMPETENT TO MANAGE THEIR EDUCATIONAL AFFAIRS

Cleveland, Nov. 1.—Former U. S. Senator James W. Wadsworth, of New York, principal speaker at the dedication here last week of the new $2,000,000 John Hay Commercial High School, assailed proposed Federal control of education.

Mr. Wadsworth visualized what would happen under such a school system. Senators and Representatives opposed to Darwinism, he declared, would fight appropriating money for schools teaching the evolution theory. Again, he said he could hear in imagination a certain Senator demanding that teachers make it clear the Pope is a menace. Compulsory anti-liquor teaching advocates, Senator Wadsworth said, would come forward to battle for the doctrine of prohibition in the schools. Aerial discussion of school history, with the view in mind of showing "the seductive and beneficial influence of King George V," would be held.

The new high school was dedicated to the memory of the Secretary of State in the McKinley administration. It covers an area equal to a city block. Mr. Wadsworth is married to a daughter of the late Mr. Hay, who made Cleveland his home for many years.

Senator Wadsworth's Talk
The Senator's talk follows, in part: "The greatest educational effort the world has ever seen is going on here in the United States. We spend more money upon it, infinitely more than upon any other public undertaking. Every cent of that money has to be earned by some one and contributed to education in the form of taxes.

"Often we complain against some of the things upon which government spends our earnings, but seldom do we complain against the efforts of government to improve and expand the work of the school. I am sure this work is closer to our hearts than any other and that we are more willing to make sacrifices for it than for any other. We make mistakes occasionally in our great experiment in self government, some of them very costly, but, generally speaking, we have made no mistake in our great educational policy.

Free of Domination Now
"I am not sure that you agree with me, but I like to assure myself that our great educational program is free from the domination of a single master. I derive satisfaction in the knowledge that the responsibility is distributed throughout the 48 states of the Union. The people of the several states are thoroughly competent, when roused, to provide and maintain proper schools for their children. And we should remember, too, that when the people of a community hold themselves primarily responsible for the success of an undertaking, such as this, that very sense of responsibility keeps alive in them an undying interest in the work. Remove the responsibility, and the interest subsides.

"We would not have achieved much in the work of education were it not for the deep and constant interest of millions of citizens who, as they saw their children go to school day after day, realized that they were responsible in the last analysis for the training the youngsters were receiving. Let us not forget that the good home and the good school are near neighbors and allies in this great cause. If through over-centralization of school management, we finally separate completely the home from the school, then the latter has lost its most dependable and in the long run most intelligent friend.
