Lovely Afternoon Frock Is of Beige Crepe

One of the recent popular creations from the French capital is a charming afternoon frock of beige flat crepe with a ruffle around the skirt just below the belt. The collar and cuffs are trimmed with lace.

Two-Tone Tweed Makes an Interesting Outfit

When unable to decide between two shades of a rich green tweed, did it ever occur to you to choose both? Some wise couturier must have escaped a dilemma in just such a manner when he planned a suit that found its way to an eminent position in a shop window. One shade of the green mixed tweed was darker, yet brighter than the other. The body of the jacket suit had utilized the lighter shade but couldn't resist the darker tone color for swagger flap pockets and collar on the coat. The skirt was slightly flared, but not longer than six inches below the knee. This was taken as a commentary on the popular length of sports costumes.

Fritz Mahaney

(Chapter one, in which I feel compelled to talk about my idiosyncrasies.)

My name is Fritz Mahaney. I was not baptized Fritz. The boys around the old home town long ago decided that Fritz sounded better than Fred, and it is not customary to ask boys for a reason for their likes and dislikes. I hope the reader may not be bored; but I find it necessary to feature my story with a great deal about my insignificant self. I am not the hero; and yet, owing to a strange run of circumstances, am so wrapped up with the characters and events of this narrative that I find it impossible to present the facts without making my tale a sort of autobiography. Now, don't think I am going to write about automobiles. An autobiography, I am told, has to do with one's self.

To begin with, the reader must know that when still a very small boy I succeeded in throwing my mother and father into a state of terror by an extraordinary piece of conduct. One night my mother, who had a habit of stealing to my bed to tuck me in and repeat her good-night kiss, found my bed empty. Of course the police department of our village, consisting of one officer, and the family doctor, were summoned immediately. A diligent search was instituted, and it was mother herself who, to her horror, discovered me walking, fast asleep, up and down Cottage Street, some distance from home. The family doctor gently stroked his long beard and stared at me until I began to think he had become transfixed. "Madam", he said at length, addressing my mother, "you needn't be at all alarmed at Fritz's somnambulistic propensities; he'll probably grow out of them. In fact, it is only an idiosyncrasy." And he charged my mother five dollars for this consoling bit of information. I remember later in the same day seeking out my father and asking him just what the doctor meant. "Don't bother about it," he said. "Some people snore in their sleep; others talk in their sleep. That's the sort of idiosyncrasy them have. Yours is to walk in your sleep."

Proud of His Idiosyncrasies

My father's way of putting it not only dispelled my alarm, but made me rather proud of myself. I was anxious to know how many of my friends could boast of an idiosyncrasy. I was determined to find out. I met little Joey Burke.

"Joey," I asked, "do you snore in your sleep?"

"No, I don't think so."

"Do you talk in your sleep?"

"No."

"Do you walk in your sleep?"

"No."

I looked at him with something akin to contempt. "Joey", I said, "You have no idiosyncrasy."

"What's an iddy-sink-racies?" asked the astonished Joe. I gave much time explaining to the boy that he was not in style if he did not possess an idiosyncrasy. Thereafter I was a hero among the younger inhabitants of upper Main Street and vicinity.

Sleeping in a Haunted House

The particular idiosyncrasy which I developed in my early years was not without its cause. Previous to the experience related in the early paragraphs of this narrative Will Bacon, a neighboring boy and I had passed a whole night in what was supposed to be a haunted house. We had secured permission of our parents to build a camp out in the open as a sort of vacation. The haunted house, the abandoned mansion of a rich old gentleman who had been murdered, stood near the site selected by us. Will Bacon didn't believe in ghosts and insisted that so long as the furniture of the murder victim was still in the house we should sleep there one night during our vacation just for the experience of it.

I must say that throughout the entire harrowing experience Will never once lost his nerve. I cannot say the same about myself. We found the front door of the old mansion unlocked and partly open, rusting on its hinges. The place was quite filled with bats, which we spent a lively hour driving out before we could think of sleeping. There were about a dozen clocks in the house and all had stopped at the hour of twelve, and when we recalled that it was precisely at the hour of twelve that the owner was supposed to have been slain, this fact was in itself enough to give me the "creeps." Will lost no time falling into a sound slumber. By the light of a dingy old oil lamp I tried to read myself to sleep. How slowly the hours dragged along. It seems to me that after reading two and a half pages I caught myself nodding. I thing I had half formed a resolution to jump to my feet and take a walk around the room. Then things began to happen.

A Loud, Whirring Noise

Suddenly I started to my feet with a gasp and listened intently. There was a loud whirring noise and my hair seemed to stand on end. I glanced at my watch. It marked twelve to the minute. As I was still gazing at its face, the watch slipped from my nerveless fingers and dropped to the floor. At the moment every clock in the house began to strike and continue slowly tolling off the hours until each had registered twelve. This was succeeded by a deadly silence and a cold shivering came upon me. I tried to call Will. But what was it that froze his name upon my lips? Between him and myself there stood a sort of veil, a mist. I stood rooted to the spot in an agony of fright. The lamp at my side began to grow dimmer and dimmer while the mist became brighter and brighter. And as the lamp finally sputtered out its life the mist was no longer a mist but a luminous shadow—yet far more than a shadow.

A large number of Rochester people, and especially members of the Knights of Columbus, were well acquainted with Fred T. Gallagher of Oswego, N. Y. Grand Knight of the Oswego Knights of Columbus for many years, and a very active welfare worker during and after the World War. Mr. Gallagher died recently, and his funeral was one of the largest held in Oswego in many years, several thousands of people attending. The Rev. Timothy Howard, rector of the church from which he was buried, broke a rule of his church by preaching a splendid eulogy on Mr. Gallagher's life and work.

Newman Club Plans Its Work For Semester

The newly organized Newman Club, composed of Catholic students at the University of Rochester, held an important meeting on Thursday evening this week, and made plans for its work for the new semester, which began on Wednesday. The Rev. John M. Seglinger, spiritual advisor to the College students in the Diocese, and the officers of the club are anticipating a busy season, and a number of suggested activities were discussed.

Announcement of appointment of standing committees of the club was made by Harold J. Kemp, president. The committees represent the men's and women's colleges of the University, the Rochester Dental Dispensary, and the Eastman School of Music, all branches of the University.

Appointed on the executive committee are: Edward Hart, Pascal de Surra, Robert Griffin and Katherine LeFevre; social commitee, William J. Miller, chairman, Joseph E. Morrissey, Edward Donovan, Mary W. Bott, Mary Skehan, Helen Rochwalski, and Katherine O'Donnell.

The membership committees will consist of: Men's college, Willis J. Barrett, Lloyd Schermerhorn, John E. Hart and Vincent Alessi; women's college, Katherine Love, Hedwiga Silberstein and Elizabeth Sullivan; Eastman School of Music, Vera Southwell, Rose Marie Brancata, and William Rogers; Dental Dispensary, Helen Wahl.

A visiting committee, whose duties will be to visit members when they are ill, will be composed of: Men's college, Elmer Lolande, Anthony Giambrone, and Charles Erdle; women's college, Mary E. Ottaviano, Marian Flaherty, and Beth Manning; Eastman School of Music, Margaret Leonard, Margaret Drury; Dental Dispensary, Mary J. Lucid and Mary Tourney.

The officers of the Newman Club, who were installed at the last meeting of the term just closed, are Harold Kemp, president; Marie Freer, vice-president; Ruth Walser, secretary, and Marie Harper, treasurer.

Dame Fashion Smiles

By Grace Jewett Austin

Just the other day Dame Fashion was among a group of young people, and they all wanted to show her something, or tell her something.

Grace J. Austin.

"You thought people would never carry muffs any more, Dame Fashion, because women's hands are so busy. But some of us really like them. See this pretty little mink muff! I think it adds a real touch to my new coat."

Another girl was showing her cherry satin pumps, just dyed to match a long and swishy formal gown, and she said:

"See my latest gift of attachable jeweled silver straps on my pumps. I never wanted to wear anklets, like a Hindu, but these flexible straps help to keep pumps in place and are so pretty, into the bargain."

Still another declared:

"Now we have this dress-length business all worked out. This is the very latest, and the correct thing. From any time in the morning till five o'clock in the afternoon, skirts from four to six inches below the knees are correct. From five to eight o'clock, there is a transition period, when girls and women are allowed varied choices in length. Then at eight comes a mystic hour as fateful as Cinderella's stroke of twelve. By the strict rule, after that hour, skirts drop right down almost to the toes. You get the idea, do you not? You may wear these long skirts, too, if you wish, from five to eight, but for a 'real doings' such are getting to be the rule, after eight."

More and more, as Dame Fashion studies the new styles, they seem to have the happy designation of "peace garments." Just as a soldier's uniform would take him through his day, in wartime, whatever he might meet, so in these years since the war, a woman could put on a "dressy sports" dress in the morning wear it to luncheon, to an afternoon club, and unless for a formal event, onward into the evening. She was really on a war-uniform schedule, was she not?

But after all, what is more restful to a woman than changing her attire? Dame Fashion certainly would not want to go so far as an enthusiastic speaker who declared: "The designer wants to see women revive good dressing to be a full-time occupation." Women are exceedingly clever. Travelers from the Orient tell us of the Japanese custom of speaking of a "two, three, or five kimono day," to designate temperature that needed more or less clothes. So in days to come, women may often leave home carrying a convenient case with a second, or possibly a third costume.

Many years ago a wise woman said, "To have foot comfort, change your shoes several times a day." It may be we shall sometime look back and think it was barbarous to have worn one dress straight through a day.

Party Frock—Red and White Crepe de Chine

The French capital is offering numerous dainty little party frocks for youngsters. One of them is in lovely red and white crepe de chine, featuring a pleated skirt with a white kid belt.

Satin Is Now Popular as Trimming Material

The mellow note of satin in eggshell or delicate beige is possible to many dark-hued dresses and suits that otherwise seem trying to the complexion. Old frocks are made new through the addition of pleated satin at neck and wrists, collar and cuffs edged in neat points or scallops. Gilets or blousettes, as they are sometimes termed, are shown in innumerable versions with frilled or jabot necklines.

BOOK REVIEW

LITURGY THE LIFE OF THE CHURCH. By Dom Lambert Beauduin, O.S.B. 2nd and Revised Edition. The Liturgical Press, Collegeville, Minn. Paper bound, 111 pages, 1929. Single copies, 35c postpaid.

This book was the first volume published in the Popular Liturgical Library by the Liturgical Press of St. John's Abbey. The new edition is completely reset in new and better type with improved general appearance.

The book answers fundamental questions on the why and the wherefore of a liturgical movement. The author was the leader in the spread of the movement in Belgium almost twenty years ago, just as Belgium was the leading country in taking up the movement itself. The five chapters of the first part of the present book deal with the following topics: The Fundamental Principle; Present Condition: Nature of the Evil; Sad Consequences of the Present Condition; Advantages of a Liturgical Piety; The Liturgical Movement. In the second part the author discusses the liturgy in its relation to asceticism, prayer, preaching and theology. This part is of special value to priests, seminarians, and religious; but should also be of much interest to the alert and intelligent layman. The book contains a wealth of thought that is never exhausted in one reading. It might be called a companion-book on the basic ideas of the Christian liturgical life.

St. Anthony Art Prize Is Offered

Milan, Feb. 14.—In connection with the celebration of the centenary of St. Anthony of Padua next year, the Franciscan Culture Circle of Milan is offering a prize of 10,000 lire for paintings, sculptures or designs depicting an incident from the life of the great thaumaturgist.

At the close of the contest, May 31, 1930 the judges may award the sum in whole or in part in accordance with the merits of the entries.

Knights Ready For Fun Festival, February 22d

The Rochester Knights of Columbus and their friends are all ready for the big annual Fun Festival that will be opened in the Columbus Auditorium on Saturday evening, February 22d, and that will close on Saturday evening, March 1st.

Dr. Walter B. O'Neill, chairman of the event, and his associate workers have completed a mass of details for the festival. There will be a fine lot of booths, stocked with all kinds of goods, and with capable workers in charge.

The auditorium of the Knights of Columbus building in Chestnut Street is to be transformed into the Main Street of a country town for the Fun Festival of the Rochester Council, Knights of Columbus, to be held February 22.

Banners will be strung across the "street" announcing the fact that "Rochester Councilville" is having "Old Home Week." The general store will be in charge of Lawrence B. Weber.

Dr. O'Neill announces that a patriotic program will feature the opening night. A band concert will be given and the "village gates" will be opened by Grand Knight Doyle, accompanied by prominent members from other cities.
