Or it may be that in the genuine "ensemble" the idea of matching is carried out further than with the suit. The latter may have a dozen different blouses, but in many cases with the ensemble the blouse matches the skirt of the coat lining, or perhaps, as in the modern silk ensemble, a coat in plain color of silk matches the groundwork color of the dress worn with it.

An excursion among hundreds of house dresses, the other day, gave Dame Fashion the reflection—"What pretty colors women wear in the morning!" Once upon a time, many years ago, there were probably thousands upon thousands of yards of cotton material manufactured in this country for house dresses, all of a solid color, with perhaps a small sprig of white in it—probably a sort of ill inheritance from Quaker and Puritan days.
