The Season

The seasons come, the seasons go. They swiftly pass all in a row. The first to come is spring. When flowers in bloom shed rare perfume.

Then comes the summer, bright and warm. With lightning flash and thunder storm. To mark the green things grow.

The cattle graze on summer days. And warm south-breezes blow. The season next to come is fall.

When in the fields the peasants call. And the hunter with his gun in quest of game, that will not fail.

Tells us the summer's done. Then winter comes with cold and snow. When from the north the chill winds blow.

And nature dormant lies. 'Tis then the trees are bare of leaves. And when again the skies.

But winter, too, will pass away. And soon again will come the day that brings the dawn of spring. When flowers in bloom will shed perfume.

And the birds again will sing. John A. Twanley
