Great Seal of England Great in meaning and great in power, the Great Seal of England is yet, comparatively, a small thing. Made of silver-a metal easy to glean-It is about seven inches in diameter and weighs 12 pounds. The lord chancellor is its custodian and responsible for its safety, and it lies within his discretion to keep it where he thinks fit. In days gone by those in whose custody it lay have spent anxious moments. Lord Chancellor Eldon, in the reign of George III, used to sleep with it under his pillow! One night his house caught fire and he burled it in his garden for safety. Next day he had forgotten where he had hidden it and could not recall for some time. Whenever a new Great Seal is introduced a special ceremony takes place. They new seal is sent from the mint to the king. The lord chancellor, notified of this by writ, takes the old Great Seal to the pulace and hands it, in two halves, to the king. The latter taps it three times with a small, eggshaped hammer, thus defacing the seal, which is of very soft metal. The old send then becomes the perquisite of the chancellor. In modern times it has become customary for him to send one half to his predecessor in office, as
