SPEAKER FLAYS RELIGION, NUN GIVES ANSWER

all the earmarks of a communistic demagogue, launched forth into a bitter attack on Christianity in general and on the Catholic Church in particular. For your information we submit some of the doctrines he propounded. They run somewhat as follows: Law comes from custom not from God. He is a liar who says law comes from God. Moses as the originator of the Ten Commandments is a myth. We must face this fact and other facts. There is no devil, no heaven, no hell. Purgatory is just a sham used as a means for the Catholic priests to collect fees. Paul is mostly in error. He guessed wrong, he always guessed wrong, particularly regarding Christ's second coming. We need a moralism on the kind of religion that teaches us how to die. There has been too much crooked thinking on the part of those who teach religion.

CHAPTER IX
Owen Meets Andy
The white quiet moon stood directly over Moonlight Manor and silently washed with glory the garden with its hundreds of night-candles and the pastures rolling around it with their dainty mares and exploring wild things. Love and grain sent forth their sweetness and the air was heavy with the almost intoxicating scent of wild honeysuckle.
The man coming down the road that he took like all the night must walk softly. With his heart and arms wide. It was an hour of adoration that seemed merging with the repressed desire about the Great Fairy. From the joy and fullness of its enchantment Owen felt that presently his cup would be overflowing, too, and that he must endeavor to contain his joy, must yield.
There was a tightness in his throat and a swelling in his heart. He had come home. Home.
He had chosen to walk to the barn to his sanctuary as he had left it on foot. And now, almost stepping through the violets and the fragrant air with unweary head he came to the garden gate.
He lifted his arms high above his head and raised his face to the lighted blue-black vault of the Lane sky. "God God," he cried though no sound came from his lips. "I've come back. Back to home and love. And You. He closed his eyes for an unbelievably exquisite second and when he opened them again he saw her. Andrea.
He knew it was Andrea. There was no other face in the world that could be so utterly sweet, flooded with the earnestness of the moonlight. He could not move. Only look upon his second glory that God had sent him unworthily as he was. His heart must have reached out and touched hers for suddenly she too made a little lifting gesture with her hands and raised her face to the stars. Then oh terror. She burned that here she had folded her arms in her crutch and Owen Kennedy's resting was a wracking sob from the soul of the girl he loved.
Stunned Owen watched her. And presently Andrea lifted her eyes and tapped on the garden flags she sought the vine hung rustic seat and the comfort of her rosary.
"It is not, Andrea. Something bad, is Owen Kennedy as he whispered that. He knew that never in all this world could he feel about anyone again, the hushed sweet thing he felt when this girl had lifted her face to heaven. He knew that this girl should have been Andrea O'Doone. But that she wasn't. A crutch. A crutch for a girl like that? And heartbreak. Why? Andrea had never told him that one of her sisters was crippled. He had never seen a crutch. Who could never awaken in him now - the depths of - oh God. Andrea was expecting him. Where was she? The sobbing still caught the girl's breath at intervals, and though he was scarcely conscious of movement, Owen Kennedy was standing by her side. This must be Mary-
"Good evening," he said it very softly.
Andrea looked up. And suddenly it seemed almost as if God had come to stand before her, because she had begged so hard.
"Good evening," Her voice was soft, too, and they looked at each other for a little while, without words.
"Why do you cry?"
"Because I love somebody."
Owen smiled a bit whimsically. "And you are a girl, aren't you?"
"Yes, I am. If you cannot help it, the one you love, then you must, anyway."
"Oh, yes. And whom do you love?"
"Why, Owen Kennedy."
"Owen Kennedy? Where is he?"
"Yes. But but but its it's no use now."
"Why?"
"Oh, You aren't God are you? Owen smiled. "Surely, but in what is your name? Please tell me that."
"An Maryana."
"An I see. And you love this Kennedy? Where is he?"
"He is in the house with my sister, Andrea."
"What?" Owen said that so sharply that Andrea came back to her senses with a start. "Who was this stranger? Why did he question her? Why did she answer? As if he really were God? Truly she was all wrong this day."
"You say Owen Kennedy is in your house with Andrea? No, no, don't be alarmed. Wait, everything is all right. I have a friend named Kennedy and I wonder could it be he? I understand that you sometimes keep folks overnight. Maryana? Do you think I might find a night's rest in this lovely place. Perhaps it is - or Kennedy?"
"Why, yes. I think you may. We have two extra here now but you come in. My mother never turns anyone away. And - maybe he is your friend?"
Neither of them stopped to analyze their emotions right then. But in spite of the mystery a sinister one that Kennedy sensed, he felt a strange elation within. And Andrea felt it too.
