How could I not, Andy? You led me here, and you were three I know. Even while you were happy you felt hurt, inside. Why did you do it, dear? I could love you as you are.

There, Alanna. How that sounds. I understand. You didn't expect an old man like me to fall in love with a little girl, did you? And you could have a grand make-believe forever.

Such a nice age, darling. I love men to be forty. 'Will you just you, Owen, and you? You love girls to be lame?'

I love you, Andy. We will not think about the other. You will be my money or love can make you well. You will be my money or love can make you well. You will be my money or love can make you well.

Little inky eye little blinky eye. I'll roay nose, here let me do it. Andy Alanna. Little reddish mouth little chinny chin.

Owen please. 'Little inky eye little blinky eye. I'll roay nose, here let me do it. Andy Alanna. Little reddish mouth little chinny chin.'

But she couldn't feel sorry for anything very long, with Owen standing beside her. She had toiled and worried the night long and concluded that she was all wrong inside. To love one man for a whole year and then suddenly love a different one, just as deeply.

CHAPTER XX A Prince—Still in Disguise Maryanna and Kennedy without as much as 'by your leave' helped themselves to Angel and Kate and scamped down the fragrant driveway never seeing the little tableau in the summer-house.

'Let us take the road to the right-Banks,' suggested Maryanna, thinking what a flood of memories they ought to bring to an old Genesee. 'For was that not the old Genesee road and was not the Genesee River renowned in history, remote as well as promiscuous? Anyway it was a glorious sight to behold. The thin ribbon of stream winding placidly between the steep vari-colored banks that were tree-capped and reminiscent of Indian wars and Indian love scenes.'

But neither of them uttered a word. The garden and all they felt that heaven had entered their hearts. Time and age pique and circumstance mattered not. They were in love.
