The BUSINESS REVIEW

ASTA Builds Cold Weather Resistance Realizing that cold resistance can be built up through proper eating and drinking, scientists began to delve into the component parts of various foods for their beneficial properties. For 30 years chemists and laboratory technicians have been working out the problems that have arisen during the development of a proper food, whether liquid or solid. Experiments began in 1905, centered around a liquid prepared from herbs, grains and seeds of various kinds and finally one was made from barley. This was given to under-nourished children and the results attracted much attention. These experiments were continued and a germination process was added. From this a drink was prepared that not only contained more food value, but also contained digestive agents that aided the body in assimilating other foods. Further improved, the drink was placed on the market under the trade name of Asta, derived from the principle enzyme diastase, which aids the stomach in the digestion of other foods. Asta which is sold by all grocers is rich in vitamins especially B, vital to the growth of children. It also contains the mineral salts so essential to sound and properly developed teeth and bones. Asta has been accepted by the Medical Society of the County of Monroe.
