The BUSINESS REVIEW

Science Examines Drinks For Protective Qualities

Realizing that cold resistance can be built up through proper eating and drinking, scientists began to delve into the component parts of various foods for their beneficial properties. For 30 years chemists and laboratory technicians have been working out the problems that have arisen during the development of a proper food, whether liquid or solid. Experiments began in 1905, centered around a liquid prepared from herbs, grains and seeds of various kinds, and finally one was made from barley. This was given to under-nourished children and the results attracted much attention. By this time it was realized what a large demand there would be for such a product, and development work from then on was taken over by a pharmaceutical concern. Thus from the original discoveries of Liebig, a noted scientist, came a food drink beneficial for the whole family. Further improved, the drink was placed on the market under the trade name of Asta, derived from the principal enzyme, diastase, which aids the stomach in the digestion of other foods. Many different kinds of flavors were introduced, until some coffee was finally added which had first been treated to a caffeine-removing process. This gave the drink a distinct and pleasing coffee flavor without affecting the food qualities. Asta, which is sold by all grocers, is rich in vitamins, especially B, vital to the growth of children. It also contains the mineral salts so essential to sound and properly developed teeth and bones.
