FROM "THE MASS"—DUNNEY

Prayers at the Foot of the Altar

Hundreds of years ago the "Judica me, Deus" was composed by a poor exile. The author of the psalm had been cast among heathen enemies who taunted him about his God. It bespeaks a longing to return and take part in the service of God's temple, a heartache to pour itself forth in public worship, a burning desire to go to the altar of God Who alone can wipe away every tear.

Who can forget that psalm, so doleful, so pathetic in every line? What the pagan Babylonians did to the chosen people when they were in exile, that same thing do scoffers and bitter critics nowadays attempt when they malign Catholics who are true to their faith in Jesus Christ and His Church.

The Church urges us in the Mass to say the Confiteor so that we may approach God with a humble contrite heart, and with a confession of unworthiness upon our lips. We must ask, too, for fullest forgiveness from God before whose altar we kneel.

The Mass speaks to us of the need of contrition and confession. These are made manifest at the earliest moment. The priest standing before the lowest step of the altar, recites the liturgical confession; bowing down, he prays to God for forgiveness of his sins.

When the priest says the Confiteor, he assumes an attitude of humility, he appears as a humble penitent, acknowledging his sins and striking his breast, the usual gesture of sorrow; after which he petitions God, and asks all to petition Him, for the one thing he most needs, forgiveness. It is natural to confess sin and unworthiness before engaging in so solemn an act as the Mass.

The liturgical confession, as it is called, is made at the lowest step of the altar. It was a form of general confession (before everybody) and was called the "Confiteor." The double form is used in Mass—that is, the priest says the prayer to the people, the people say it (through the server), to the priest. In so doing they are following a very ancient practice. "Confess your sins one to another, and pray one for another, that you may be saved." (James v, 16). That is just what is done before the priest ascends the altar steps.

The Introit and Kyrie

The priest, ascending the altar steps, goes over to the missal, signs himself with the sign of the cross, and reads the Introit. Originally this part was sung as the priest was entering the church and approaching the altar. To borrow the phrase, it was a priest's march. In the old days, the Introit was generally a Psalm sung as a fitting accompaniment of the solemn entrance of the celebrant into that part of the church where the altar stood. The structure of the Introit consists mainly of scattered verses from the Psalms or detached fragments from the prophets.

After the Introit, the priest returns to the middle of the altar, where with hands joined he recites aloud the Kyrie Eleison, a plea to God. You will notice that the Kyrie Eleison is not Latin, but Greek. These nine invocations have been said in the Mass for nearly 1,500 years. In a very ancient book is an account of how St. Caesarius, Bishop of Arles, explains that in Rome and the churches of the East they said Kyrie Eleison over several times "with much love and compunction." So we should say it, for this is a real prayer to be said for ourselves with much sorrow for our sins, and for others who may need God's mercy.

The Gloria and Dominus Vobiscum

Standing at the middle of the altar, the priest extends his hands, then joins them; and, slightly bowing, he says the Gloria in Excelsis. This song of joy is sung or said in the Mass most of the time, except in Lent and Advent when the priest wears purple vestments. It is a translation from an old Greek hymn sung in the early centuries. It is a "private psalm" written in short verses which are very beautiful and full of exultant praise.

The priest kisses the altar, and turning to the people, says: "Dominus vobiscum," an ancient form of devout salutation. This is the way the early Christians saluted one another; and it is said to have thus been handed down by the Apostles. Now the priest says this to you in order to pass on, so to say, our Lord's spirit to you. He does this eight times in the Mass.

You will notice that the priest when saying Dominus vobiscum extends his hands and opens his arms with reverence and affection to indicate the blessing is for all the people. In the early days of the Church when the priest greeted the people, all the faithful answered just as a choir does today. But now the altar boy answers, none the less should you say the same words inwardly from the fullness of your heart.

Sunday's Mass

A GUIDE TO THE LITURGICAL YEAR

By The REV. PAUL BUSSARD
(Editor, The Leaflet Missal)

BLESSED ARE THEY

Those who in ancient times were learning to become Catholics (the Catechumens) entered on this Sunday upon a new phase of their instruction. Between this Sunday and Holy Week they were examined seven different times on what they had learned and also on the way they were living. Similarly they were exorcised seven times. All these seven exorcisms are found together in shortened form in the ceremony of Baptism.

This fact should help us to understand the Epistle today and the Gospel, too. The Epistle is a plea that they (and we) turn from the common pagan vices and throw our lot in with the children of light, for we are no longer darkness (pagans).

The Gospel is very appropriate for the beginning of the exorcisms. Notice, also, the Tract. It is almost a complete psalm. The slave who loves his master, the slave-girl who loves her mistress, look at the hands of their superiors to anticipate the spoken command. It is a lesson in attention and in the willingness with which every Christian should carry out the details of God's commands.

Blessed are they, says the Gospel, who hear the word of God and keep it.
