By W. BOYCE MORGAN

INSTALLMENT V

Buzz and Jimmy reached the bank above the mill race only a few seconds after Sylvia had gone over. They ran her in the water below, struggling toward Mary. Jimmy hesitated only an instant, then plunged down the bank.

"I've got to get Sylvia out!" he cried. "She can't swim very well."

Buzz was right behind him as he slid down the bank. They saw that Sylvia had reached Mary. The water was evidently over the girl's heads as this point, and it was so cold that it numbed their bodies. The two boys plunged into the water, gasping as the water soaked through their clothes.

They kept their feet as long as possible in the tumbling current, then swam the few strokes necessary to reach the girls. Sylvia saw them, but for a moment she would not lose her grasp on Mary who was helpless from the effects of her fall over the bank and the icy water.

"Get Sylvia in," Buzz managed to gasp through his chattering teeth. "I'll get Mary."

dropping on our secret meeting, or the other things you did. So if we give promise to forget what you did, will you two boys forget all about the initiation?"

Buzz and Jimmy looked at each other, then nodded vigorously at Vi.

"We promise," said Buzz to his sister. "After this, we'll let you face security alone. But see that you don't put any more rough initials!"

THE END

They kept their feet as long as possible in the tumbling current.

Jimmy caught his sister's clothes (as behind her neck, and together they paddled their feet until they reached the water. Meanwhile, Buzz had got his capped hand under Mary's chin, and was pulling her limp body toward the bank. It wasn't far, but his clothes felt like lead and his legs and arms were almost completely numb from the effects of the icy water.

For a moment panic gripped him. He wasn't going to be able to make it! Then he heard a gruff voice.

"Grab this rope!" the voice called. Then a loop of rope whirled through the air and landed almost in his clutch. He caught it, and the strong arms of the roughly dressed man pulled him into shallow water. By this time he was so dazed and cold that he could hardly stifle a sob, but some how he managed to get the half-conscious Mary out of the water and up the bank.

The first thing Buzz saw was his sister Vi, her face as white as a sheet and the other girls of the sorority grouped behind her. Then he saw Jimmy and Sylvia, dancing up and down a try to get warm. The roughly dressed man who had dressed them from the water grabbed Mary and began to pump her arms.

"You kids better get in the car and get home as fast as you can," he said gruffly. "If you don't get your wet clothes off, you'll all have pneumonia."

Vi turned quickly. "Your car has a good heater, Helen," she said to one of the other girls. "Run down and get it started."

Then Vi grabbed Sylvia, jerked the girl's wet coat off, and put her own coat around her. She hurried her toward the porch.

"Silly Buzz and Jimmy followed, their lips blue and their teeth chattering."

Helen had the motor of her car roaring by the time they got to it and read a flood of warm air was coming from the heater. She quickly back'd the car out into the road, and it was the four soaked figures huddled together in the back seat, she swung out into the Franklin road and headed toward town.

The Luce home was the first house, and Helen stopped there. Mr. and Mrs. Luce were both out, but Sylvia insisted that Mary come in with her. Vi and Helen took the two girls up to Sylvia's room, put their wet clothes off, rubbed them dry with towels, and put dry dresses on them.

Meanwhile, Buzz and Jimmy were doing the same thing in Jimmy's room. By the time they were dressed in dry clothes, the other girls were all warm enough to feel that they were a little. They looked at each other and grinned rather slyly.

Then the doorbell rang. At a nod from Sylvia, Vi went to the door, where she stood talking for several minutes.

"That was the other girls," she explained. "I told them you were all right, and they're gone home." She managed to smile, rather feebly. "I guess there won't be any more initiations like that tonight—or ever, as far as we are concerned."

Then Vi turned to Buzz. "What I want to know is, where did you and Jimmy come from?" she demanded.

Sleepily, Buzz explained. Vi listened, and her face was a study in mixed emotions.

"Well, it was a pretty silly thing to do, Buzz," she said. "But I guess you haven't any room to talk. And if you had your beer there, Sylvia and Mary might have drowned."

"I know we shouldn't have done it," Buzz said. "But it really wasn't our fault they fell in the water. It was their own fault for making that mistake."

"And who was that man?" Jimmy demanded. "He was out there the other day when we were making the dummy."

"The girls just explained that to me," Vi replied. "It's that dreadful fellow who lives by himself in a little shack not far from the old mill. Some of the girls recognized him after we left and they said he wouldn't hurt a fly. He just saw the lights over at the mill and came over to see what was going on."

"Well, he certainly scared us plenty when he appeared in the door of the mill," Vi said. "That was even worse than finding the dummy hanging there."

A silence fell. Then Sylvia looked across at Vi and Helen, the girl who had driven them home.

"I'm sorry I failed you the tea out there," she apologized. "I guess I won't keep my beer there, Sylvia and Mary."

A silence fell. Then Sylvia looked across at Vi and Helen, the girl who had driven them home.
