There is this one consolation to be found in examinations, -- they wind up the school term and that means vacation. Then, for the good old summer time with its barrel of fun. But may I remind you that the missions must go right on, summer or winter, no maller. These little orphans whom we've saved in the past year have to eat, they must be clothed and sheltered. So, while you're out enjoying your selves, don't forget them. You know well enough the one big thing that we can keep right on doing whether we'll be in school or not. And that of course is to pray. I'm going to count upon the good prayers of all you missioners And not now and then, either But every day. I'm sure you won't let

A SHORT STORY

By Julia Singer "How could be be so mean!" mourned Mary Leu ever her selt boiled egg. She swallowed hard and blinked but in spite of herself, a big salty tear rolled down her sheek and tear rolled down her cheek and landed with a plop on the spoon. Wearily, and with an air of utter despair, she dabbed at her eyes and sighed deeply. Try as she would, she couldn't hold the sobe back, and between sniffles she moaned, "In all the eight years of wooh," she broke off, "he's never has a savery with we hefer This been so angry with me before. This is the first time he's gone off is work and hasn't kissed me good bye."

Out in the hall, she could hear the mumbling sounds that men make when they eas't find their hat like heard quick steps thump-ing up the stairs. Apparently he had forgetten something. Maybe had forgetten something. Maybe ha'd come back into the dining rooms and make up with her.
