mately one-half of the children and youth of America receive no formal religious instruction according to a report, "Religiou and Children in a Democracy," prepared for presentation and group discussion at the White House Conference on Children in a Democracy to meet there January 18 to 29.

Yet religion, the report points out, is presented as one of the fundamental easentials of the preservation of a democracy. Teaching religious is aders of the country have been called into the conference to help solve this problem, which is thus defined: "how to tuitilize the resources of religion in meeting the needs of children without in any way violating freedom of conscience or the principle of separation of Church and Stats."

Because Code Questlemed
